detected by Pigott on 10 Sept. 1784, and on 5 Dec. he assigned to its changes a period (about 26 minutes too long) of 7 days 4 hours 38 minutes (ib. lvxv. 127). He also essayed the establishment of an artificial system of photometry. A catalogue of fifty variable or suspected stars was published by him in 1786 (ib. lxxvi. 189), with the remark that 'these discoveries may, at some future period, throw fresh light on astronomy.' In a paper on the geographical co-ordinates of York he gave, in the same year, the first practical application of the method of longitudes by lunar transits, independently struck out by him (ib. p. 409). On 3 May 1786 he observed the transit of Mercury at Louvain (ib. p. 389), and after his return to England sent to the Royal Society an account of an auroral display viewed at Kensington on 23 Feb. 1789 (ib. lxxx. 47). His next residence was apparently at Bath, where he discovered the fluctuations of R Corone and R Scuti (ib. lxxxvii. 133). Six years later he gave a further discussion, from fresh materials, of the latter star's period (ib. xev. 181). The conclusion of this paper was written at Fontainebleau in 1803. In it he strove to account for the observed irregular waxings and wanings of stellar brightness by the rotation of globes illuminated in patches. He inferred, moreover, the existence of multitudes of 'dark stars,' and surmised that the 'coal-sacks' in the Milky Way might be due to their aggregations. Pigott is said by Madler to have been an early observer of the great comet of 1807. This is the last we hear of him.

[Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Mädler's Geschichte der Astronomie, ii, 21, 265; Berliner astr. Jahrbuch, 1782 p. 146, 1788 p. 161; cf. Herschel's Memoir of Caroline Herschel, 1876, p. 103.] A. M. C.

PIGOTT, SIR FRANCIS (1508-1537), rebel. [See Bigon.]

PIGOTT, SIR GILLERY (1818-1875), baron of the exchequer, fourth son of Paynton Pigott, who in 1836 assumed the additional names of Stainsby-Conant, was born at Oxford in 1813. His mother was Lucy, third daughter of Richard Drope Gough. He was educated under the Rev. William Carmalt of Putney, was called to the bar at the Middle Temple on 3 May 1839, went the Oxford circuit, and was made counsel to the inland revenue department in May 1854. In 1856 he became a serjeant-at-law, and in the following year received a patent of precedence. As a liberal, he sat in parliament for Reading from October 1860 to October 1863. He advocated reform in the anomalous laws of Jersey, but his proposed bill did not proceed. beyond a second reading. In December 1857 he was chosen recorder of Hereford, and on 2 Oct. 1863 was appointed a baron of the court of exchequer, and on 1 Nov. knighted by patent. No judge administered justice with a stricter impartiality. He took a prominent part in the discussion of many social questions. He died at Sherfield Hill House, Basingstoke, on 28 April 1875, after being thrown from his horse.

He married, in 1836, Frances, only child of Thomas Duke of Ashday Hall, near Halifax, by whom he had a family, which included Arthur Gough Pigott and Rosalie Pigott.

The judge published 'Reports of Cases decided in the Court of Common Pleas, on Appeal from the Decisions of the Revising Barristers,' 1844-6.

[Foss's Lives of the Judges; Law Times, 1 May 1875, p. 17; Illustr. London News, 31 Oct. 1863 p. 433 with portrait, 8 May 1875 p. 451, 12 June 1875 p. 571; Graphic, 1875, xi. 483, 486, 492; Ann. Reg. 1875, p. 140.]

PIGOTT, NATHANIEL (d. 1804), astronomer, born at Whitton, Middlesex, was the son of Ralph Pigott of Whitton by his wife Alethea, daughter of the eighth Viscount Fairfax. He may have been the grandson of Nathaniel Pigott, barrister-at-law (1661-1787), a Roman catholic and intimate friend of Pope, who eulogised him in an epitaph inscribed in the parish church of Twickenham (Cobbett, Memorials of Twickenham, p. 97). The younger Nathaniel Pigott married Anna Mathurina, daughter of Monsieur de Bériol, and spent some years at Oaen in Normandy for the education of his children. Academy of Sciences of Caen chose him a foreign member about 1764, and he observed there, with a Dollond's six-foot achromatic, the partial solar eclipse of 16 Aug. 1705 (Phil. Trans. lvii. 402). His observations of the transit of Venus on 3 June 1769 were transmitted to the Paris Academy of Sciences; his meteorological record at Caen, from 1765 to 1769, to the Royal Society of London, of which body he was elected a fellow on 16 Jan. 1772. He was in friendly relations with Sir William Herschel.

Happening to be in Brussels on his way to Spa in 1772, he undertook, at the request of the government, to determine the geographical positions of the principal towns in the Low Countries. The work occupied five months, and was carried out at his own expense, with the assistance of his son Edward and of his servants. The longitudes were obtained from observations of the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites, the latitudes by means of meridian altitudes taken with a Bird's quadrant lent by the Royal Society. Pigott described these operations in a letter to Dr. Maskelyne, dated Louvain, 11 Aug. 1775 (ib. lxvii. 182), and their results were printed at large in the 'Memoirs of the Brussels Academy of Sciences' (vol. i. 1777). He was chosen a foreign member of the Brussels Academy on 25 May 1773, and a correspondent of the Paris Academy on 12 June 1776.

Pigott spent part of the summer of 1777 at Lady Widdrington's house, Wickhill, Gloucestershire, of which he determined the longitude, and then took up his residence at Frampton House, Glamorganshire, on his own estate. Here he fitted up an observatory with a transit by Sisson, a six-foot achromatic by Dollond, and several smaller telescopes. Tie ascertained its latitude, and in 1778-9 discovered some double stars (Phil. Trans. lxxi. 84, 347). In 1783 he sent to the Royal Society an account of a remarkable meteor seen by him while riding across Heworth Common, near York (ib. lxxiv. 457); and observed at the Collège Royal, Louvain, a few days after his arrival from England, the transit of Mercury of 3 May 1786 (ib. lxxvi. 384).

Pigott died abroad in 1801. His son Edward is separately noticed. His second son. Charles Gregory Pigott, assumed the name of Fairfax on succeeding his cousin, Anne Fairfax, in 1793, in the possession of Gilling Castle. Yorkshire; he married in 1794 Mary, sister of Sir Henry Goodricke, and died in 1845.

[Nichols's Herald and Genealogist, vii. 155; Bernoulli's Recueil pour les Astronomes, supplément, cahier iv. 67, vi. 44; Berliner astronomisches Jahrbuch, 1782, p. 146; Notices biographiques de l'Acad. de Bruxelles, 1887; Conn. des Temps pour l'an 1780, p. 816; Thomson's Hist. of the Royal Soc.; Poggendorff's Biogr.-lit. Handwörterbuch; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Wolf's Geschichte der Astronomie, p. 738, where, however, Nathaniel Pigott is confounded with his son.] A. M. C.

PIGOTT, RICHARD (1828?-1889), Irish journalist and forger, was born in co. Meath, probably at Ratoath, about 1828. His father, George Pigott, was clerk to Peter Purcell, the Dublin coach proprietor, and he afterwards entered the office of the 'Monitor,' a Dublin journal, whose office was subsequently used by the 'Nation.' The elder Pigott was also for a time in the office of the 'Tablet' newspaper.

Richard Pigott, after holding a situation as errand-boy in the 'Nation' office, went to Belfast as clerk in the office of the Ulsterman,' a newspaper edited by Denis Holland, and advocating extreme nationalist opinions. Holland transferred his paper to Dublin in July 1858, and changed its name to 'The Irishman; 'Pigott acted as its manager. The paper was soon purchased by Patrick James Smyth, the politician, but Pigott exercised almost complete control over it. One of its characteristics was a violent hostility to the 'Nation' newspaper, which was then edited by Alexander Martin Sullivan [q.v.], and in 1862 the latter brought against Pigott an action for libel, in which Pigott was condemned to pay sixpence damages.

In June 1865 he was presented by its proprietor with the 'Irishman,' which had hitherto met with no conspicuous success. Pigott seems at this as at later periods to have been in pecuniary difficulties, and to have sought to supplement his income by the sale of indecent photographs. But the arrest and imprisonment of the staff of the 'Irish People,' and that paper's suppression in September 1865, caused a sudden advance in the circulation of the 'Irishman.' It became a valuable property, and Pigott was brought to public notice. His increased resources he squandered in profuse hospitality and luxurious living. Ilis only commendable recreation seems to have been swimming, in which he was an expert throughout his early life. In 1866 he started a small weekly magazine entitled 'The Shamrock,' and shortly after another weekly periodical called 'The Flag of Ireland.' His political views remained of an extreme nationalist colour, and his papers openly supported the fenian move-In 1867 he was condemned to twelve months' imprisonment for publishing seditions matter, and swore in court that he was a fenian; but he does not seem to have formally joined the society. In 1871 he was imprisoned for six months for contempt of court. But he was distrusted by his fellow nationalists, and the circulation of his papers steadily declined during the next nine or ten years. After the establishment of the land league in 1879, he offered to sell his journa-After the establishment of the land listic property to that organisation. The terms he asked were deemed exorbitant, but at length the negotiations resulted in the transfer of the three newspapers, the 'Shamrock,' the 'Flug of Ireland,' and the 'Irishman,' to the Irish National Newspaper and Publishing Company, of which Parnell held the chief shares as trustee of the Land League [see Parnell, Charles Stewart]. With the sale of his papers his last chances of earning an honest livelihood seem to have disappeared, and he was driven to the meanest expedients in order to keep up a somewhat pretentious establishment at Vesey Place, Kingstown, co. Dublin. He began to blackmail his political associates, libelled them in anonymous tracts and pamphlets, and offered to sell to the government information incriminating them. From William Edward Forster [q. v.], to whom he made offers of this kind, he received no encouragement, and thereupon he attacked him venomously. In 1882 he published in Dublin a volume entitled 'Reminiscences of an Irish National Journalist,' which, despite its vilification of Irish politicians, is an interesting record of the period between 1848 and 1880, and contains a useful account of the fenian movement. A second edition was brought out in 1883. In 1886 Pigott proposed to sell to the officers of the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union an association formed in Dublin to resist the adoption of home rule by the British government-information convicting Parnell and the leading Irish home-rulers of complicity in the murders and outrages which had accompanied the rule of the land league. The proposal was accepted, and the papers which Pigott supplied to the Patriotic Union were secretly purchased by the 'Times' newspaper for publication in their columns. Early in 1887 a series of articles entitled 'Parnellism and Crime' appeared in that newspaper, and was in part based on Pigott's revelations. On 18 April 1887 was published in the 'Times' a letter from Figott's collection which purported to have been signed by Parnell; it condoned the Phonix Park murders. Parnell at once denied its authenticity from his place in parliament; but its astute phraseology, and Parnell's reluctance to submit its claims to genuineness to legal examination, conveyed an impression in many When Mr. quarters that he was its author. Frank Hugh O'Donnell in 1888 brought an action for libel against the 'Times' for some remarks made upon him in the course of the articles on 'Parnellism and Orime,' the counsel for the 'Times' read in court several other letters which had been purchased of Pigott, and, if genuine, seriously compromised Parnell and his friends. But these communications did not possess the same internal claims to confidence as the first published letter. The public interest in the alleged revelations was greatly increased by the victory of the 'Times' newspaper in Mr. O'Donnell's suit, and in July 1888 a special commission of three judges was appointed by parliament to inquire into the truth of all the allegations made by the 'Times' against the leaders of the home-rule party. The 'Times' refused at first to divulge the source whence the incriminating letters were obtained, but finally called Pigott as a witness on 21 Feb. 1889. His cross-examination next day by Sir Charles Russell (Parnell's counsel) completely exposed his duplicity, and little doubt was left in the public mind that he had forged the papers. On the following day, when the court did not sit, Pigott sought an interview with Mr. Labouchere, M.P., and confessed his guilt. Some hours later he fied from England, and when, on the 25th, the court reassembled to continue his crossexamination he was missing. A warrant for his arrest was issued. English police officers traced him to the Hotel los Embajadores, Madrid. But as they entered his room (No. 18) on 1 March, he shot himself dead. He was married, and two sons survived him.

[Reminiscences of an Irish National Journalist, by Pigott, 2nd edit. 1888; James O'Connor's Recollections of Richard Pigott, 1889; Sullivan's New Ireland, 1877; O'Connor's Parnell Movement, 1889, pp. 356-7; Times, 22 Feb. to 3 March 1889; Saturday Review, September 1895; information from Mr. John O'Leary, D. J. O'D. Dublin.]

PIGOTT, ROBERT (1736-1794), food and dress reformer, was born in 1736 at Chetwynd Park, Shropshire, which for three centuries had been in the possession of his ancestors. Charles I, on his way from Oxford to Naseby in 1645, stayed there three nights with his great-grandfather, Walter Pigott, whose wife was Anne, daughter of Sir John Dryden, and cousin to the poet. Walter's son Robert was high sheriff of Shropshire in 1697, and his grandson, Robert the second, to whom the Pretender presented his portrait while at Rome in 1720, was M.P. for Huntingdonshire, 1713-1734. The Pigotts had been staunch Jacobites, and the Pigott implicated in Colonel Parker's escape from the Tower in 1694 was probably one of the family [see PARKER, JOHN, A. 1705]; but Robert the third was destined to go to the other extreme in politics. At Newmarket in 1770 he and the son of Sir William Codrington made a bet of five hundred guineas as to which of their fathers would outlive the other. It turned out that the elder Pigott had died at Chetwynd a few hours prior to the bet. Pigott consequently maintained that the wager was void; but Lord March (afterwards Duke of Queensberry), as Codrington's assignee, sued for the money, and Lord Mansfield decided that the bet was valid, inasmuch as neither party knew at the time of anything to vitiate it. In 1774 Pigott was high sheriff of Shropshire. In 1776, imagining that the American war betokened the ruin of England, he sold his Chetwynd and Chesterton estates, worth 9,000% a year, and retired to the continent, where he made the acquaintance of Voltaire, Franklin, and Brissot. He lived mostly at Geneva, but paid occasional visits to England. It was, however, probably his brother Charles (infra who, in September 1789, betted that a Colonel Ross could not ride a horse from London to York in forty-eight hours; Ross won by three hours. Pigott became a zealous Pythagorean, as a vegetarian was then called, and was a dupe of the quack James Graham (1745_ 1794) [q. v.] and his electric bed.

He was enraptured by the French revolution, especially in its more extravagant aspects. He protested against Sieyès's press bill, and published his protest, which he had read to the revolutionary club at Lyons; in an appendix he advocated a vegetarian diet for prisoners as being cal-culated to reclaim them. At Dijon in 1791 he condemned the use of bread, recommending potatoes, lentils, maize, barley, and rice. In the spring of the following year he fulminated against hats, arguing that they had been introduced by priests and despots, and that they concealed the face and were gloomy and monotonous; whereas caps left the countenance its natural dignity, and were susceptible of various shapes and colours. For some weeks the cap movement was very popular in Paris, but the remonstrance addressed by Pétion to the Jacobin club put an end to it, and the bonnet rouge introduced later had no connection with Pigott. He contemplated the purchase and occupation of a confiscated estate in the south of France; but Madame Roland, who had doubtless met him at Lyons and was amused at his oddities and fickleness, predicted that he would only build castles in the air. In 1792 he probably settled at Toulouse. He died there on 7 July 1791, leaving a widow, Antoinette Boutan.

His brother CHARLES PIGOTT (d. 1794), also an ardent champion of the French revolution, published in 1791 a reply to Burke. He issued, anonymously, in 1792, a 'History of the Jockey Club,' and in 1794 a 'History of the Female Jockey Club,' two scurrilous pamphlets on London society, with which he seems to have been well acquainted (his authorship of these pamphlets is admitted in the preface to Records of Real Life, infra). He is said to have also written 'Treachery no Orime,' and other works. He died at Westminster on 24 June 1794, leaving a satire entitled 'A Political Dictionary,' which was published in 1795.

Another brother, William, rector of Chetwynd, had a daughter HARRIET PIGOTT (1766-1846), who embraced catholicism, visited Paris after the Restoration, being there admitted into aristocratic circles, and died at Geneva. She published anonymously in 1832 'Private Correspondence of a Woman of Fashion.' Another, partly autobiographical work, entitled 'Records of Real Life,' appeared in 1839, and 'Three Springs of Beauty' in 1844. She died in July 1846, having (by will dated 24 Nov. 1845) bequeathed a diary and other manuscripts to the Bodleian Library.

[Pedigree in Brit. Mus. Addit. MSS. 28734 and 28616, fol. 23; Madame Roland's Letters to Bancal; Hulbert's Hist. of Salop; Avenel's Anacharsis Cloots, Paris, 1876; Gent. Mag. 1794, pt. ii. pp. 672 and 958; Alger's Englishmen in French Revolution and Glimpses of French Revolution; Biographie Universelle, art. 'Harriot Pigott' (inaccurate in date of death).]

PIKE, PIK, or PYKE, JOHN (fl. 1322?), chronicler, was master of the schools of St. Martin-le-Grand, London (cf. Bibl. Reg. MS. 13 O. xi). He wrote: 1. Suppletio Historiæ Regum Angliæ.' There are three fourteenth-century copies of this work: Cotton. MS. Julius D. vi, Arundel MS. 220, and Bibliothèque Nationale, 6234, Fonds Latin, olim Baluze. A modern copy is in British Museum Harleian MS. 685, f. 46. In Julius D. vi. f. 1, the rubric states that it was extracted by Johannes Pik 'de compendio Brome,' i.e. from the 'Compendium' of John Brome, an Augustinian, who died in 1449. Pike's work is chiefly compiled from Ralph de Diceto's 'Abbreviationes,' 'Imagines,' and 'De Mirabilibus Angliæ,' and from Brome's 'Compendium.' Two passages are printed in Gale's 'Scriptores XV' (i. 553, 560), under the name of Diceto. history of the Norman kings is brought down to the coronation of John.

In ista Compilacione tractatur quale jus dominus noster Rex Angliæ intendit habere ad terram Scotie; 'this consists of extracts from named chroniclers and a short history of the relations of Edward I and Edward II to Scotland, down to the death of Thomas of Lancaster [q. v.] in 1822 (Jul. D. vi. f. 67, and Arundel MS. 220, f. 278). 8. A history of English bishoprics, enlarged from Diceto's (Arundel MS. 220, f. 147 b). The history of Canterbury has been, in part, printed by Wharton (Anglia Sacra, ii. 677), and erroneously ascribed to Diceto (STUBES, Diceto, vol. i. p. lxxxviii). The lives of the bishops are brought down in some cases only to the coronation of John, in others to a later date, the latest being that of the consecration of John, bishop of Norwich, in 1299. Walter Reynolds (1814–1327) is included in the list of archbishops; a later hand adds his two successors. That the author was Pike is proved by references to passages in the 'Suppletio' (No. 1 above). 4. Another collection of extracts closely similar to the 'Suppletio' in character (Arundel MS. 220, ff. 4, 52; Harl. MS. 3899). The history of the British kings (extracted from Geoffrey of Monmouth) is here much fuller than in the 'Suppletio.' After extracts on the Saxon and Norman kings, the chronicle is carried to the birth of Edward, prince of Wales, in 1239.

Bale, Pits, and Tanner, in stating that William Horman [q.v.], vice-provost of Eton, made an epitome of Pike's 'Suppletio,' confound Pike with Picus Mirandulæ.

[Hardy's Catalogue, ii. 124, iii. 12, 376; Glover's Livere de Reis de Brittanie, p. xii; Pits, De Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus, s. an. 1116; Bale's Scriptorum Catalogus, p. 170, No. 61.]

PIKE, JOHN DEODATUS GREGORY (1784-1854), baptist, eldest son of John Baxter Pike, was born at Edmonton on 6 April 1784. His mother, a daughter of James Gregory, a London merchant, claimed descent from Oliver Cromwell, and was highly educated.

The father, John BAXTER PIKE (1745-1811), descended from an artisan family of old standing in Lavington, Wiltshire, was the son of Thomas Pike, a class-leader among the early methodists. His mother was his father's second wife, Eleanor (Baxter). He attracted the notice of Archbishop Secker and Richard Terrick, bishop of London, and was ordained a deacon in the Anglican church, but subsequently came under the influence of Dr. Andrew Kippis and turned unitarian preacher (1777). Later he fluctuated between presbyterianism and advanced rationalist views, but for a time devoted his energies to a boarding-school, first at Stoke Newington, then at Edmonton. About 1791, however, he was practising as a doctor in London, while his wife conducted a boarding-school for young ladies at Entield. Subsequently he appears to have taught 'geography and belleslettres' in the school at Enfield. He died at Edmonton on 11 Dec. 1811, and was buried in a family vault at East Barnet. His wife died at Edmonton in 1838. A man of active mind and various interests, Pike contributed to the 'Monthly Magazine' letters on horticulture, poultry-farming, and kindred subjects (notes supplied by E. C. Marchant, esq.

After being educated, chiefly at home, John Deodatus was from 1802 to 1806 at Wymondley (nonconformist) College, Hertfordshire, and became a baptist. On leaving college he acted for three years as classical assistant in the school of his uncles, G. and R. Gregory, at Lower Edmonton. In June 1809 he attracted some notice at the annual association of general baptist churches held at Quorndon, Leicestershire, by urging the formation of a baptist missionary society. In 1810 he accepted the pastorate of the Baptist church, Brook Street, Derby, and, to supplement his income, kept a boarding-school for a few years. A new chapel was opened in April 1815 three times as large as the first; in four years it was enlarged; and in 1842 a larger building was secured at St. Mary's Gate.

In the early days of his pastorate a native missionary at Serampore had been supported by Pike's church. At the annual association at Boston, Lincolnshire, in June 1816, his earlier proposal was accepted, and the General Baptist Missionary Society formed. He was appointed first secretary, and issued a small pamphlet on missions on behalf of the committee. In 1819 he undertook a preaching tour in Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire, to excite a missionary spirit, and undertook the training of young missionaries in his family. From January 1822 he was editor of the 'Missionary Observer,' which was appended to 'The General Baptist Repository.' He died suddenly at Derby on 4 Sept. 1854. By his wife Sarah (d. 1848), daughter of James Sandars of Derby, whom he married on 22 June 1811, Pike had four sons-all of whom became baptist ministers-and two daughters.

Pike showed some independence of thought amid many strongly marked prejudices. He opposed catholic emancipation. His religious books and tracts had a wide circulation here and in America. It was estimated that over six hundred thousand copies of his works were circulated in America, and at least eight hundred thousand at home. The copyrights of the most popular he presented to the Religious Tract Society and American Tract Society in 1847. The chief were: 1. 'A Catechism of Scriptural Instruction for Young Persons, 1816. 2. 'The Consolations of Gospel Truth,' London, 1817; 2nd edit. Derby, 1818; vol. ii. Derby, 1820; a selection entitled 'True Happiness' was issued at Derby and London, 1822 and 1830, 32mo. 3. 'Persuasives to Early Piety, Derby, 1819; London and Derby, 1821 and 1830; also by the Religious Tract Society, London, no date, and the American Tract Society, New York, no date. An abridgment was published at Derby in 1837, and a French translation by the Toulouse Book Society in 1841. This was Pike's most popular work. 'A Guide for Young Disciples of the Holy Saviour,' 1823, was a 4. 'Swedenborgianism depicted.' sequel. 1820; answered by the Swedenborgian Robert Hindmarsh [q.v.] 5. 'Religion and Eternal Life,' Derby and London, 1831; by the American Tract Society, New York, 1885. 6. Ohristian Liberality in the Distribution of Property, Religious Tract Society, London, 1836.

'A Memoir and Remains,' with portrait, of Pike was edited by his sons, John Baxter and James Carey Pike, London, 1855, 8vo. 'Sermons and Sketches,' with short memoir abridged from the former, was published in London in 1861, 16mo; and in 1862 and 1863 a complete edition of his works, with biographical sketch, was published in

| Momoir and Remains above mentioned ; General Baptist Magazine; Repository and Missionary Observer, 1861, pp. 463-8; AmosSutton's Mission to Orissa, 1833, pp. vii, 1-10. For John Baxter Pike see Young's Annals of Agriculture. ii. 230; Lysons's Environs of London, ii. 251 Reuss's Alphabetical Register; Birgr. Dict. of Living Authors, 1816; Monthly Magazine, 1800. 1810, passim.]

PIKE or PEAKE, RICHARD (ft. 1625), adventurer, born at Tavistock, Devonshire, took part as a common soldier in the attack on Afgiers which was made by a force under the command of Sir Robert Mansell in the winter of 1620-1. After some leisure at home, Pike in the autumn of 1625 joined as a volunteer the expedition to Oudiz, and, sailing in the Convertine with Captain Thomas Portar, arrived at Cadiz on 22 Oct. 1625. After taking part in the capture of the fort of Puntal, at the entrance to the harbour, he sallied out into the neighbouring country, unaccompanied, to gather oranges, and was made prisoner, after a smart encounter with fourteen Spanish musketeers The Earl of Essex, the vice-admiral, learning of the mishap, vainly offered to ransom him; and the English fleet sailed away on the 27th without him. Pike was sent to Xerez, and was brought before the Duke of Medina-Sidonia and other Spanish dignitaries, who closely examined him as to the equipment and future intentions of the English ships. Angered by his questioners' importunity, he accepted an offer which they mockingly made him to fight a Spanish champion in a hand-to-hand combat with rapier and poniards. Pike easily disarmed his opponent. Thereupon, armed with a quarter-staff, which he described as his national weapon, he gave battle to three Spaniards armed with rapiers and poniards. He killed one of his foes and disarmed the other two. His judges were so much impressed by his prowess that they gave him money, and one of them, the Marques Alquenezes, entertained him at his house. News of his exploits reached Madrid, and the king (Philip IV) summoned him to court. He was presented on Christmas day 1625 to the king, the queen, and Don Carlos, the infante. He declined the king's offer of a yearly pension to serve him by land or sea, but gratefully accepted one hundred pistolets and permission to return to England. Passing through France, he arrived at Foy (Fowey), Cornwall, on 23 April 1626. On 18 May he delivered in London a challenge to the Duke of Buckingham, with which he had been entrusted by a brother-in-law of the Conde d'Olivares (Court of Charles I, i, 104).

d'Olivares (Court of Charles I, i. 104).

In July 1026 Pike published an account of his encounter with the three Spaniards in a tract (now rare) called 'Three to One.' It was dedicated to Charles I. Although Pike apologises at the outset for writing with 'fingers fitter for the pike than the pen,' he tells his story with admirable spirit. A friend (J. D.) contributed at the close some verses in Pike's praise. The tract (a copy of which is in the British Museum, catalogued under Peake) was reprinted in Arber's 'English Garner' (i. 621).

Pike's adventures were also dramatised in 'Dicke of Devonshire, a tragi-Comedy,' which was first printed from the Egerton MS. 1994 by Mr. A. H. Bullen in his 'Collection of Old English Plays,' 1883, ii. 1-99. The piece is assigned by Mr. Bullen to Thomas Heywood—a more likely claimant than James Shirley, to whom Mr. Fleay proposed to assign the play, after cancelling a conjecture that it was by Robert Davenport. Fike's courage was commemorated later in the century in a broadside ballad entitled 'A Panegyric Poem, or Tavestock's Encomium,' which is reprinted in Mrs. Bray's 'Tamar and the Tavy,' and contains the lines:

Search whether can be found again the like For noble prowess to our Tuv'stock Pike, In whose renown'd never-dying name Live England's honour and the Spaniard's shame.

[Bullan's Introduction to his Old Plays, ii. 1 sq.; Mrs. Bray's Tamar and Tavy.] S. L.

PIKE, RICHARD (1834-1893), mastermariner, born in 1834 at Carboniere in Conception Bay, Newfoundland, was brought up in the northern fisheries, in whaling and sealing, and in 1869 obtained command of a steamer engaged in that trade. In 1875 he was captain of the Proteus, a stout-built vessel of 467 tons and 110 horse-power, which in 1881 was chartered by the United States government to carry Lieutenant Greely and his party through Smith Sound to Lady Franklin Bay. This was safely effected; and, in 1883, the Proteus, still commanded by Pike, was again chartered to carry out relief to the expedition, the United States ship Yantic being ordered to accompany her as a depôt, as far as was prudent, but not to venture into the ice, for which she was not fitted. On 23 July, off Cape Sabine, the Proteus was nipped in the pack and sank almost immediately; no lives were lost, but there was scant time to save some provisions and clothes. Sometimes in the boats, sometimes painfully dragging them over the rough ice-floes, Pike and his companions succeeded, after extreme hardship, in reaching Upernavik, where they were taken up by the Yantic. For that year there was no relief to Greely's party; but the survivors were rescued in the following year. In 1891 Pike, in the steamer Kite, was engaged to carry Mr. R. E. Peary and his party, which he put on shore in McCormick Bay in Murchison Sound (lat. 77° 43' N.), and returned without misadventure. In the next year her brought the party back, and was to have taken Peary out again in the summer of 1898. The arrangement was cancelled by Pike's death, at St. John's, on 4 May. 'A typical Newfoundlander,' wrote his shipmates in the Kite, 'as active in mind and body as many men of half his years.' 'A quiet, unassuming man, wrote a correspondent of the Times, thoroughly capable and reliable, unequalled as an Arctic navigator, and in the front rank of our sealing captains.'

[Times, 20 May 1893; Greely's Three Years of Arctic Service, i. 37, ii. 163; Keely and Davis's In Arctic Seas (with what seems a good portrait), pp. 24-6; Mrs. Peary's Arctic Journal.]

J. K. L.

PIKE, SAMUEL (1717?—1773), Sandemanian, was born about 1717 at 'Ramsey, Wiltshire' (Wilson'), which may mean Ramsbury, Wiltshire, but more probably Romsey, Hampshire. He was educated for the independent ministry, receiving his general training from John Eames [q. v.] of the Fund academy, and his theology from John Hubbard at Stepney academy. His first settlement was at Henley-on Thames, Oxfordshire, about 1740. Thence he removed in 1747 to succeed John Hill (1711—1746) as pastor at the Three Cranes meeting-house in Fruiterers' Alley, Thames Street, London. Early in his London ministry he established, at his house in Hoxton Square, an academy for training students for the ministry. He adopted the principles of John Hutchinson (1674-1737) [q.v.], and defended them (1753) in a laborious work. In 1754 he succeeded Zephaniah Marryat, D.D. (1684?-1754), as one of the Tuesday lecturers at Pinners' Hall. About the same time he joined Samuel Hayward (1718-1757), independent minister at Silver Street, Wood Street, Cheapside, in a Sunday-evening lecture, dealing with 'cases of conscience,' at Little St. Helen's, Bishopsgate Street. His 'Body of Divinity' (1755) was criticised by Caleb Fleming

[q.v.] In 1757 Pike became acquainted with the views of Robert Sandeman [q. v.], the sonin-law and disciple of John Glas [q. v.] Sandeman had published (1757) a series of 'Letters' dealing with the 'Dialogues between Theron and Aspasio' (1755), by James Hervey (1714-1758) [q.v.] The Letters' were admired by members of Pike's church; and Pike, on reading them, began (17 Jan. 1758) a correspondence with Sandeman, then in Edinburgh. The correspondence, as it proceeded, was communicated to Pike's church, with the result that he, and a section of his people, came gradually into Sandeman's views; while others showed such dissatisfaction that Pike ceased the correspondence, suppressing his fourth letter. He began, however, to adopt (flassite or Sandemanian usages, including a weekly communion. This led (August 1758) to rumours of his unsoundness; his discourses at Pinners' Hall gave offence, and he was excluded from the lectureship in 1759 by fortyfour votes to one, Dr. John Conder [q. v.] being chosen to succeed him on 3 Oct. In his own church he was hotly opposed by William Fuller and Thomas Uffington. A church meeting (9 Oct. 1750) came to no conclusion; church meetings on 13 Jan. and 21 April 1760 were equally divided (seventeen votes on either side), but Pike's casting vote carried the exclusion of the malcontents, who formed a new church under Joseph Barber. Disputes then arose about possession of church property, and a lawsuit was begun (1761) by Pike for recovery of an endowment of 121. a At length he resigned his charge (14 Dec. 1765), left the independents, and became a member of the Sandemanian church , in Bull-and-Mouth Street, St. Martin's-le-Grand. He was chosen 'elder' in 1766, and ministered with great acceptance.

From London he removed in 1771 to minister to a Sandemanian congregation at Trowbridge, Wiltshire. Unfounded reports were spread of his insobriety. He was a man of character and ability and considerable biblical scholarship. A curious reaction led him from the doctrines of Hutchinson, who tound in scripture a system of physical science, to those of Glas, who held that biblical authority did not extend to such topics. He died at Trowbridge in January 1773, and was buried on 10 Jan. in the parish churchyard. His portrait, engraved by Hopwood, is given in Wilson. He was married, and left issue.

He published, besides single sermons (1748-53): 1. Philosophia Sacra Natural Philosophy. Extracted from Divine Revelation, &c., 1753, 8vo; Edinburgh, 1815, 8vo. 2. Thoughts on such Phrases of Scripture as ascribe . . . Passions to the Deity, &c., 1753, 12mo. 3. 'Some important Cases of Conscience, &c., 1755-6, 8vo, 2 vols. (the substance of lectures by Pike and Hayward); substance of lectures by Pike and Hayward); Glasgow, 1762, 8vo; with title 'Religious Cases of Conscience,' 1775, 8vo; 1807, 8vo; Romsey, 1819, 8vo; Philadelphia [1859], 12mo; with title 'The Doubtful Christian encouraged,' &c., Woodbridge [1800], 8vo: in Welsh, 1769, 12mo. 4. 'A form of Sound Words; or . . . Body of Divinity,' &c., 1755, 12mo; 1756, 12mo (based on the shorter catechism of the Westminster assembly), 6 (Public Fasting,' &c., 1767, 12mo. 1758 5. 'Public Fasting,' &c., 1757, 12mo; 1758, 8vo. 6. An Epistolary Correspondence between . . . Pike and . . . Sandeman, &c., 1758, 8vo; in Welsh, 1765, 12mo. 7. Saving Grace, Sovereign Grace, &c., 1758, 8vo (lectures at Pinners' Hall); 1825, 8vo. 8. Free (frace indeed!' &c., 1759, 8vo; 1760, 12mo. 9. 'A . . . Narrative of the . . . Schism in the Church under . . . Pike, &c., 1760, 8vo. 10. 'Simple Truth Vindicated,' &c., 1760, 12mo (anon). 11. 'The Nature and Evidence of Saving Faith, &c., 1764, 8vo. 12. 'A Plain . . . Account of . . . Practices observed by the Church in St. Martin's-le-Grand,' &c., 1766, 8vo; 1767, 12mo. 18. 'A Compendious Hebrew Lexicon, &c., 1766, 8vo (annexed is a short grammar); Glasgow, 1802, [Wilson's Dissenting Churches of London, 1808, ii. 85 sq., 253; information from the parish register, Trowbridge, per the Rev. H. Trotter.]

A. G.

PILCH, FULLER (1803-1870), cricketer, eldest son of Nathaniel Pilch and Frances Fuller, was born at Horningtoft, near Fakenham, Norfolk, on 17 March 1803. Brought up to the trade of a tailor, he showed more than an ordinary taste for cricket as a boy, and is said to have been early instructed in the game by William Fennex, one of the famous Hambledon players. At the age of seventeen, with his brothers Nathaniel and William, he played his first match at Lord's, when he assisted Norfolk against the Marylebone Club. Though he failed with the bat

William Ward, who made 278 for Marylebone, already predicted his future success. Moving temporarily to Bury St. Edmunds in 1825, he formed one of the powerful Bury Club, for which he played innings of 91 and 82, both not out, in 1826, and scored 187 not out against the Woodbridge Club in 1830. Meantime, in 1827, he had again appeared at Lord's for England against Sussex, when the new 'roundhand' bowling was publicly tested, and he proved the highest scorer in that historical match with an innings of 38.

Removing to Norwich in 1829, he there in 1833 defeated at single wicket Thomas Marsden, the Yorkshire champion, making 73 to the 7 and 0 of his opponent. In the same year he again overcame Marsden at Sheffield before twenty thousand spectators, obtaining 78 and 100 against Marsden's 25 and 31. In the two matches between Norfolk and Yorkshire in the following year Pilch made scores of 87 not out, and 73 and 153 not out, to which he added another of 105 not out for England v. Sussex, against the bowling of William Lillywhite.

In 1835 he transferred his residence to Town Malling, and from 1836 to 1854 formed one of the Kent eleven, receiving a salary of 100%, a year for his services. From 1841 to 1851 he was a member of Clarko's All-England eleven, but did not play in very many of their matches. During this period his chief innings were 107 for Benenden v. Kent, and 125 for Nottingham v. Twentytwo of the Forest and Bingham clubs in 1836; 160 v. Reigate, with Lillywhite, in 1837 (then considered the most wonderful feat on record); 114 for Chalvington v. Brighton, with Lillywhite, in 1839; 98 for Kent v. England in 1842; and 117 for Marylebone v. Western Counties, with Lillywhite, Dean, and Hillyer, in 1845. His last appearance at Lord's was in 1851.

Pilch stood six feet in height, and possessed a great reach, which he further increased by designing a bat of the regulation length but with a very short handle, allowing a corresponding gain in the blade. His style of play was entirely forward, its feature being the smothering of the ball at the pitch before the twist or rise could take effect. The cricket buried in Kensal Green cemetery. chronicler, John Nyren (1764-1887) [q.v.], used to say that Pilch's play almost reconciled him to round-arm bowling. Throughout his career he was opposed to some of the greatest bowlers that have appeared, and ranked among the finest batsmen and rungetters. There was no player to contest his supremacy until George Parr [q. v.] reached his prime, about 1850. Of a kindly disposition and quaint humour, Pilch was universally respected. He died on 1 May 1870 at Canterbury, whither he had removed and opened a shop for the sale of bats and other cricketing implements in 1842. He was buried in the churchyard of St. Gregory's. He was not married. The best portrait of him is in Pycroft's 'Cricket Field' (2rd edition, 1859). A but which he used is in the pavilion at Lord's Cricket Ground.

Lillywhite's Scores and Biographies of Celebrated Cricketers, 1862; Pycroft's Cricket Field, 3rd edit., 1859; Denison's Sketches of the Players, 1846; Sporting Magazine, 1833; Gale's Game of Cricket, 1888; information supplied by the Rev. F. C. de Lona Lane, Whissonsett Rectory, East Doreham, and Henry Perkins, esq., secretary to the Marylebone Cricket Club.]

PILCHER, (1801-1855) GEORGE aural surgeon, son of Jeremiah Pilcher of Winkfield, Berkshire, was born on 30 April 1801, and was admitted a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England on 2 April 1824. Immediately afterwards he began to practise as a surgeon in Dean Street, Soho, London, and was soon appointed lecturer on anatomy, physiology, and surgery at the Webb Street school of medicine. Snow's Fields, then belonging to his brotherin-law, Richard Dugard Grainger. He was for many years consulting surgeon to the Surrey Dispensary. In 1838 he was awarded the Fothergillian prize at the Medical Society for his treatise 'On the Structure and Pathology of the Ear,' and in 1842 he was elected president of the Medical Society of London. When the Webb Street school was reabsorbed into the Borough hospitals from which it had originally sprung, Pilcher became attached to Lane's school, which was affiliated to St. George's Hospital. At that hospital he became lecturer upon surgery on 6 July 1843, and in the same year he was made an honorary fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons of England on the foundation of that select class of members. In 1849 he was admitted a member of the council of the Royal College of Surgeons of England. He died suddenly on 7 Nov. 1855, and was Pilcher was an able surgeon and a good physiologist. He entered upon the practice of aural surgery at a time when the quackery of John Harrison Curtis had raised. that speciality to an unenviable notoriety. To Toyrbee, Pilcher, Yearsley, and Harvey aural surgery in this country mainly owes the position it now holds in the estimation of the medical profession. Pilcher pub1178 lished: 1. 'Essay on the Physiology of the Excito-motory System, read before the Medical Society, 1885. 2. 'The Structure, Economy, and Diseases of the Ear,' with plates, 8vo, Loudon, 1838; 2nd edit. 1842. 3. 'Some Points in the Physiology of the Tympanum,' read before the physiological section of the Medical Society of Loudon, 28 Ech of the Medical Society of London, 23 Feb.

[Obituary notice in the Medical Times and Gazette, 1855, ii. 510; information kindly supplied by Roger Eykyn, esq.]

PILFOLD, JOHN (1776?-1831), captain in the navy, second son of Charles Pilfold of Horsham, was born at Horsham about 1776. He entered the navy in 1788 on board the Crown with Commodore Cornwallis, and served in her during her commission in the East Indies, returning to England in May 1792 [see CORNWALLIS, SIR WILLIAM, 1744-1819]. He then joined the Brunswick, in which he was present in the battle of 1 June 1794 [see HARVEY, JOHN, 1740-1794], and was specially recommended by Harvey for promotion. On 14 Feb. 1795 he was promoted by Lord Howe to be lieutenant of the Russell, and in her he was present in the action off Lorient on 23 June. In September 1795 he was appointed to the Kingfisher sloop on the Lisbon station, in which he took part in the capture of several privateers; and on 1 July 1797, being the first lieutenaut, supported the commander, John Maitland, sword in hand, in suppressing a violent mutiny which broke out on board. Pilfold was shortly afterwards moved into the Impétueux, in which, on 6 June 1800, he commanded the boats in the destruction of the French corvette Insolente in the Morbihan [see PDLLEW, EDWARD, VISCOUNT EXMOUTH]. On the reuewal of the war in 1803 he was appointed to the Hindostan, from which he was moved to the Dragon, and afterwards to the Ajax. In the latter he took part in the action off Cape Finisterre on 22 July 1805. William Brown (d. 1814) [q.v.], the captain of the Ajax, went home with Sir Robert Calder [q.v.], who was to be tried by court-martial, and the Ajax was left before Cadiz under the command of her first lieutenant, Pilfold, who had thus the distinction of commanding her a few days later in the battle of Trafalgar, for which he was advanced to post rank on 25 Dec. 1805, and received the gold medal with the other captains present in the action. In 1808 he was granted an honourable augmentation to his arms, and in June 1815 he was nominated commander of the Bath.

From 1827 to 1831 he was captain of the ordinary at Plymouth, and he died at Stonehouse on 12 July 1834. He married, in 1803. a daughter of Thomas South of Donhead. Wiltshire, and left two daughters.

[Marshall's Roy. Nav. Biogr. iv. (vol. ii. pt. ii.) 963; Gent. Mag. 1835, i. 322.]

PILKINGTON, SIR ANDREW (1767 ?-1853), general, born about 1767, obtained his first commission in the army on 7 March 1783, and was promoted lieutenant 24 Jan. 1791, captain 2 March 1795, major 31 March 1804, lieutenant-colonel 5 Oct. 1809, colonel 12 Aug. 1819, major-general 22 July 1830, lieutenant-general 23 Nov. 1841.

Pilkington saw much and varied service, With the Channel fleet in 1793-4 he commanded a company of the Queen's Royals on board the Royal George on 'the glorious first of June' 1791, when Lord Howe defeated the French off Ushant. Pilkington received two splinter wounds. He was next employed in the West Indies, and was present at the capture of Trinidad, 1795-7. He served in Ireland in the suppression of the rebellion in 1798, and was with the expeditions to the Helder in 1799 and 1805. He was severely wounded in the defence of the Kent, East Indiaman, against a large French privateer in 1800, on his passage to India. He served on the staff at the Horse Guards in 1807-8, and in Nova Scotia from 1809 to 1815. During the latter period he commanded several succossful expeditions. He reduced the islands in Passamaquody Bay, between New Brunswick and Maine, U.S. He was created K.C.B. on 19 July 1838. He died on 23 Feb. 1853 at his residence, Catafield Place, Battle, Sussex, which he had purchased from James Eversfield, esq.

Sir Andrew married at Hayes, on 9 May 1808, Maria Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Vicary Gibbs [q. v.], who survived him, with two daughters, Maria Georgina, married to Burrell Hayley, rector of Catsfield in Sussex, on 18 July 1848, and Louisa Elizabeth, married on 1 Sept. 1853 to Richard Thomas Lee.

[Hart's Army List, 1852; Gent. Mag. 1838 ii. 317, 1853 i. 436; Royal Military Calendar, iv. 262; Times, 1 March, 1853; Lower's Hist. W. B_T. of Sussex, pp. 95-6.]

PILKINGTON, FRANCIS (1504?-1638), lutenist and musical composer, was probably related to Richard Pilkington of Rivington, Lancashire (whose son, named Francis, died in 1597). Pilkington's father and brother were in the service of Henry Stanley, fourth earl of Derby. The lutenist found a patron in Ferdinand, fifth earl.

After joining the Chester Cathedral choir in 1578 he was admitted Mus. Bac. Oxford, on 10 July 1595, from Lincoln College (Woon). In 1612 he was minor canon, and he was precentor of Chester Cathedral from 1628 ill his death in 1638

His compositions were not distinguished by much originality (BURNEY, Hist. iii. 826, :,47). He published: 1. 'The First Book of Songs or Ayres of four parts; with Tableture for the Lute or Orpherion, with the Violl da (tamba,' 1605. 2. 'The First Set of Madrigals and Pastorels of three, four, and five parts, 1613. 3. 'The Second Set of Madrigals and Pustorals of three, four, five, and six parts, apt for vyolls and voyces, 1624. pavan by a Lord Derby appears in the same volume. Pilkington contributed two sacred songs to Leighton's 'Teares and Lamentations, ·1614. His part-song 'Rest, sweet nymphs,' has been republished in the collections of Hullah and Stafford Smith. 'When Oriana walked ' is included in Hawes's 'Triumphs, and five others in Oliphant's 'Madrigals.

Pilkington was the father or near relative of Thomas Pilkington (1615?-1650?), also a chorister of Chester Cathedral, and said to be one of the musicians to Henrietta Maria (Woon). Thomas was the inventor of the orphion, and 'did command all instruments with his unequall'd hand' (COMANNE). He died during the interregnum, aged about 35, and was buried at Wolverhampton. Sir Aston Cokayne celebrated his morits in an epitaph and an elegy.

[Wood's Fasti, i. 269; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Hawkine's Hist. pp. 493, 522, 571; Burney's Hist. iii. 326, 347; Chester accounts, by the courtesy of Mr. St. John Hope, at the Society of Antiquaries; Pilkington's History of the Pilkington Family, 1894; authorities quoted.]

L. M. M. PILKINGTON, GILBERT (A. 1850), is the reputed author of 'The Tournament of Tottenham,' a burlesque in verse on 'the parade and fopperies of chivalry.' amusing description is given, in homely language, of the efforts of ignorant rustics to reproduce all the ceremonies of the tournament by way of prelude to a rustic wedding. The earliest manuscript of the piece is in the Cambridge University Library, Ff. v. 48, and dates from the fourteenth century. It is followed by a sequel entitled 'The Feest.' Both bear the signature of Gilbert Pilkington, but it is doubtful if he were more than the copyist. In the same manuscript, which once belonged to George Withers, the poet, the words 'Quod dominus Gilbertus Pylkyngton' are appended to two other poems, one entitled 'Passio Domini,' and the other 'The Story of Robin Hood and Little John.' But of these, too, Pilkington may only have been the copyist. A fifteenth-century copy of 'The Tournament' is in Harl. MS. 5896.

William Bedwell [q. v.] once possessed the Cambridge manuscript of the piece, and printed it in 1631, in the belief that Pilkington was not only the author, but his own predecessor in the vicarage of Tottenham. The latter theory is not confirmed by any contemporary evidence. The title-page of Bedwell's edition runs: 'The Tyrnament of Tottenham, or the wooing, winning, and wedding of Tibbe, the roev's daughter there. Written long since in verse by Mr. Gilbert Pilkington, at that time, as some have thought, Parson of the Parish. Taken out of an ancient manuscript and published for the delight of others, by Wilhelm Bedwell, now l'astour there. Printed by John Norton, 1631.' Bedwell appended a description of Tottenham, with a fresh title-page. 'The Tournament' was reprinted with Richard Butcher's 'Survey of Stamford,' London, 1717, and again, 1718, 8vo; by Bishop Percy in his 'Reliques' (ed. Wheatley, ii. 17-28); by Ritson in his 'Ancient Songs and Ballads,' 1829; by Mr. W. C. Hazlitt in his 'Popular English Poetry' (iii. 82 sq.); and separately by Thomas Wright, with the sequel, 'The Feest,' in 1836.

[Warton's Hist, of English Poetry, 1871, iii, 115-16; Ritson's Bibl, Anglo-Poetica; Cat. of MSS, in Cambr. Univ. Library; Hearne's Neubrigensis, 1719, vol. i. pp. lvii-lxiii.] S. L.

PILKINGTON, JAMES (1520?-1576), first protestant bishop of Durham, the third son of Richard Pilkington of Rivington Hall, in the parish of Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, was born there about 1520. His mother was Alice, daughter of Laurence Asshawe or Hassall, and sister to Roger Hassall of Charnock Heath, Lancashire (Fos-TIR, Durham Pedigrees, p. 255). Leonard Pilkington [q. v.] was a younger brother. When he was sixteen he entered at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, whence he migrated to St. John's College. He graduated B.A. in 1588-9, and was elected fellow of St. John's on 26 March 1589. In 1542 he proceeded M.A., and in 1551 B.D. On 3 April 1548 he became one of the preachers of St. John's College, and on 3 July following was admitted a senior fellow of the college, of which he was appointed president in 1550. Strongly inclined by education and conviction in favour of the Reformation, he forwarded the change of religion by taking part in a 'disputation' on transubstantiation held at Cambridge on 24 June 1549, and by lecturing in the public schools of the university on the Acts of the Apostles. Edward VI, in December 1550, appointed him vicar of Kendal in Westmoreland, but in the next year he resigned the benefice and returned to Cambridge. When the Marian persecutions began in 1554, he fled, with other protestants, to the continent, living in succession at Zürich, Basle, Geneva, and Frankfort. While at Basle he lectured on Ecclesiastes, St. Peter's Epistles, and Galatians. He was at Frankfort when Queen Mary died, in 1558, and was the first to sign, if he did not also write, the 'Peaceable Letter' sent to the English church at Ganeva

Returning to England, he was appointed one of the commissioners to revise the Book of Common Prayer, which was begun in December 1558 and completed in April 1559. During the latter year he acted on the commission for visiting Cambridge University in order to receive the oath of allegiance from the resident members of the university. On 20 July 1559 he was admitted master of St. John's College and regius professor of divinity, and was afterwards associated with Sir John Cheke [q. v.] in settling the pronunciation of On 8 March 1559-60 he preached at St. Paul's Cross in favour of assisting scholars at the universities and increasing the incomes of the clergy. At this period he was termed bishop-elect of Winchester. He delivered the funeral oration on the exhumation of the remains of Martin Bucer and Paulus Fagius at a solemn commemoration held at Great St. Mary's, Cambridge, on 20 July 1560. In the course of this year he published his 'Exposition upon Aggeus, and was married to Alice, daughter of Sir John Kingsmill. The marriage was apparently private, and he is said to have concealed the fact at first, probably because of the prejudice of the queen against married clergy. Towards the close of 1560 he was appointed bishop of Durham, and was thus the first protestant occupant of the see. The royal assent was given on 20 Feb. 1560-1, his consecration took place on 2 March, and his enthronement on 10 April. Two days prior to the last date he preached at St. Mary Spital, London, before the lord mayor. Shortly afterwards (October 1561) he resigned his mastership of St. John's, Cambridge, wherein he was succeeded by his brother Leonard. The bishop had three brothers in the church, and took care to provide for them all. Leonard was presented to the rectory of Whitburn in 1568, John was made archdeacon of Durham, and Lawrence was collated to the vicarage of Norham in 1565, On 8 June 1561 he preached a memorable sermon at St. Paul's Cross on the causes of the destruction of St. Paul's Cathedral by fire. This discourse, in which he denounced certain abuses of the church, occasioned an angry reply from John Morwen, chaplain to Bishop Bonner. Pilkington then issued a 'confutation' in which he vigorously followed up his original exposure of the Roman catholic church. In June 1562 he preached a sermon before the queen, in which he exposed the pretensions of Ellys, the self-styled prophet. He had a hand in settling the Thirty-nine articles promulgated in 1562. A letter written by him to Archbishop Parker in 1561 or 1564 sets forth in graphic terms the general negligence and relaxed morals of the clergy in the north of England. In another letter, addressed to Dudley, earl of Leicester, in 1564, he showed himself favourable to discontinuing the use of vestments. He was a great stickler for the rights and emoluments of his see, and on 10 May 1564 obtained from the queen confirmation of the various charters relating to his bishopric. In June 1566 he procured restitution of certain temporalities, but only in consideration of a heavy annual fine to the crown. At a later date (1570) he was unsuccessful in a suit for the forfeited estate of the Earl of Westmorland, but in 1573 he successfully resisted the claim of the crown to the fisheries at Norham. During the northern rebellion of 1569 in favour of the Roman catholic revival, when the insurgents broke into Durham Cathedral, Pilkington and his family thought it expedient to flee for their lives. After his return to his diocese he wrote to Sir William Cecil, secretary of state, an account of the miserable condition of the country, and he subsequently brought under the notice of Cecil the teachings and machinations of the English catholics at Louvain, directed against the Anglican establishment. He was one of the commissioners for the visitation of King's College, Cambridge, in February 1569-70.

In 1501 and 1567 he held visitations of his cathedral, and on the second occasion the injunctions for the removal of superstitious books and ornaments and defacing idolatrous figures from the church plate were carried out with great rigour. The palaces and other edifices in his see were left by him in a wofully ruinous state, and many buildings--some, at least, of which probably were already in bad repair-were demolished by him. Strype characterises him as 'a grave and truly reverend man, of great piety and learning, and such frugal simplicity of life as well became a modest christian prelate;' and this character is borne out by contemporary writers, by one of whom he is said to have been 'much more angry in his speeches than in his doings.'

On 30 Jan. 1505-6 he granted a charter of incorporation to the citizens of Durham to be governed by an alderman and twelve burgesses. He also incorporated several of the trade companies of the city. Stimulated, it is said, by the example of his friend Bernard Gilpin, he founded and endowed a free grammar school at Rivington, which was opened in 1566, and he encouraged the foundation of a free school at Darlington. The church at Rivington was founded by his father.

Pilkington died at Bishop Auckland on 23 Jan. 1575-6, aged 55, leaving a wife and two daughters, Deborah and Ruth. He was buried at Auckland, but his remains were removed to Durham Cathedral and interred before the high altar on 24 May 1576. His tomb, now destroyed, contained a very long Latin inscription. In his will, dated 4 Feb. 1571-2, he desired to be buried with 'as few popish ceremonics as may be, or vain cost.' He left his library at Auckland to 'the school at Rivington and to poor collegers and others.' None of his books remain at Rivington, but many are in St. John's College, Cambridge, and the university library.

The church at Rivington contains a curious painting representing the bishop's parents and their twelve children. It is a copy, taken partly from the remains of the original, which was damaged by fire in 1834 and is now in possession of Lieut.-Col. John Pilkington at Sandown Park, near Liverpool, and partly from a copy made in 1821.

Among his recorded writings are several which were perhaps never printed. Those that survive are: 1. 'Disputation on the Sacrament with W. Glynn, D.D.' (in Foxe's 'Actes and Monuments'). 2. 'Sermon before the University of Cambridge on the Restitution of Bucer and Fagius' (in Foxe's 'Actes and Monuments, and in Latin in Bucer's 'Scripta Anglicana'). 3. 'Aggeus the Prophete declared by a large Commentary,' London, 1560, 8vo. 4. Aggeus and Abdias, Prophetes; the one corrected, the other newly added,' &c., London, 1562, 8vo. 5. 'A Confutacion of an Addicion, with an Apologye written and cast in the Stretes of West Chester, against the causes of burning Paules Church,' &c., 1563, 8vo. 6. 'A. Godlie Exposition upon certaine Chapters of Nelieminh, Cambridge, 1585, 4to; edited by John Foxe. The above, with extracts from the statutes of Rivington School, and a 'Tractatus de Predestinatione,' from the manuscript in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, were collected as Pilkington's works for the Parker Society (ed. Scholefield) in 1842. He wrote the homilies against gluttony, drunkenness, and excess of apparel.

The bishop's younger brother, John (1529?-1603), matriculated as a sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge, in May 1544, obtained a scholarship there, and is commemorated for his learning in Ascham's account of the college (STRYPI, Cheke, p. 49). He graduated B.A. in 1546, M.A. 1549, B.D. 1561, and was elected a fellow of Pembroke Hall in 1547. He was prebendary (of Mapesbury) in St. Paul's Cathedral from 20 Nov. 1559 to 1562. was ordained priest by Bishop Grindal in January 1560, was collated next year by his brother James, whose chaplain he was, to a Durham prebend, and from 1562 until his death in the autumn of 1603 was archdeacon of Durham and rector of Easington. He was buried at St. Oswald's, Durham, on 31 Oct. 1603. He appears to have married Ann Forde of London in November 1564. Several manuscripts formerly belonging to him are at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge.

[Strype's Works; Scholefield's Memoirs in Pilkington's Works (Parker Soc.), 1842; Cooper's Athenæ Cantabar. i. 344; Cooper's Annals of Cambridge, ii. 31, 151, 154, 161; Baker's St. John's, Cambridge (ed. Mayor); Harland and Axon's Genealogy of the Pilkingtons, 1875; Pilkington's Lancashire Family of Pilkington, 1894 (with portrait, also in Trans. Historic Soc. of Lancashire and Cheshire, 1893); Durham Wills (Surtees Soc.), ii. 8; Machyn's Diary (Camden Soc.), 1847; Foxo's Actes and Monuments; Surtees's Durham; Gent. Mag. November 1860, p. 484; Fuller's Worthies and Church History; Milman's St. Paul's Cathedral, 1868, p. 277; Longman's St. Paul's Cathedral, 1873, p. 57; Gilpin's Bernard Gilpin, 1830, p. 147; Mullinger's Univ. of Cambridge, ii. 1884.] C.W.S.

PILKINGTON, LETITIA (1712-1750), adventuress, born at Dublin in 1712, was second child of Dr. Van Lewen, a manmidwife of Dutch origin, who was educated at Leyden under Boerhaave, and settled in Dublin about 1710. Her grandmother, Elizabeth, who married a Roman catholic officer in James II's army, was one of the twentyone children of a Colonel Mead by a daughter of the Earl of Kilmallock. A precocious child, Lætitia was greatly indulged by her father, whom, in 1729, she persuaded to allow her to marry a penniless Irish parson named Matthew Pilkington [see below], the son of a watchmaker. They lived upon the bounty of Van Lewen, until Pilkington obtained the post of chaplain to Lady Charlemont. Shortly after this event, about 1730, with the help of Dr. Delany's influence [see DELANY, PATRICK] Pilkington and his wife pushed themselves into Swift's favour. Swift was then in residence at Dublin as dean of St. Patrick's, and he seems to have been taken by Lætitia's wit, docility, and freedom from affectation. The story of her introduction to the dean, as told afterwards by Mrs. Pilkington, is full of humorous entertainment. 'Is this poor little child married?' was Swift's first remark. 'God help her!' In the evening Swift made her read to him his own 'Annals of the Four Last Years of Queen Anne,' asking her most particularly whether she understood every word; for, said he, 'I would have it intelligent to the meanest capacity; and if you comprehend it, 'tis possible everybody may. For a time she was undoubtedly a great favourite of Swift, and her sprightly reminiscences, in spite of the disdain with which they are treated by some of Swift's biographers, constitute one of the chief sources of authority as to Swift's later years. It is Mrs. Pilkington who tells us of Swift's personal habits, of his manners with his servants, of his dealings with roguish workmon, of his memory of Hudibras, so accurate that he could repeat every line from beginning to end. Thackeray was quite justified in the extensive use he made of her anecdotes in his sketch of Swift in 'English Humourists,' for the internal evidence of their authenti-city is quite conclusive. The apologetic portions of her memoirs are much less worthy of credence.

The latter half of Mrs. Pilkington's life was extremely unfortunate. In 1732 Swift procured her husband an appointment in London, whither he proceeded without his wife. Literary jealousies are said to have alienated the pair. Later, however, Mrs. Pilkington joined her husband, and, according to her own account, found him living a life of profligacy. She soon returned to Ireland, with her own reputation somewhat tarnished. Her father died in 1734, and she shortly afterwards gave her husband a good pretext for disembarrassing himself of his wife, being found entertaining a man in her bedroom between two and three o'clock in the morning. Swift, writing to Alderman Barber [see under BARBER, MARY], put her case in a nutshell: 'She was taken in the fact by her own husband; he is now suing for a divorce and will not get it; she is suing for a maintenance, and he has none to give her.' After strange adventures she came to England and settled in London. Colley Cibbor interested himself in her story. and she managed for a time to beg sufficient for a livelihood. In 1748, however, she was sued for debt and imprisoned in the Marshalses. Upon her release, again owing to the good offices of Cibber, she set to work to compile her 'Memoirs,' and doubtless did not spare any efforts to blackmail some of her old patrons. The work first appeared a Dublin, in two volumes, as 'Memoirs of Mrs. Letitia Pilkington, wife to the Rev. Matthew Pilkington, written by herself Wherein are occasionally interspersed all her l'oems, with Anecdotes of several eminent persons living and dead' (1748). The work attracted a fair amount of attention, and the portions relating to Swift were extensively pillaged by newspapers and magazines: a third edition appeared at London in 1754. with an additional volume edited by her son, John Carteret Pilkington. After launching her' Memoirs, Mrs. Pilkington started asmall bookshop in St. James's Street, but the venture does not seem to have succeeded, for she once more made her way over to Ireland, and died in Dublin on 29 Aug. 1750. Among those who befriended her in her last years were Samuel Richardson, Sir Robert King, and Lord Kingsborough. 'The celebrated Mrs. Pilkington's Jests, or the Cabinet of Wit and Humour,' was published posthumously in 1751; 2nd edit., with additions, 1765. It was claimed for this curious repertory of the broadest jests that when in manuscript it had been perused by Swift, and had elicited from him a laugh. In her 'Memoirs,' however, Mrs. Pilkington explicitly states that she had never seen Swift laugh. Her 'Poems' were included in ' Poems by Eminent Ladies' (2 vols. London, 1755). Her burlesque, entitled 'The Turkish Court, or the London Prentice,' which was acted at Capel Court. Dublin, in 1748, was never printed.

MATTHEW PILKINGTON (A. 1783), the husband of Lestitia, was also a poet, having published in 1730 'Poems on Several Occasions' (Dublin, 8vo), of which a second edition, revised by Swift, and containing some additional pieces, appeared in London in 1731, with commendatory verses by William Dunkin. Swift, who afterwards had occasion to change his opinion of Pilkington, wrote, in July 1732, to his old friend, Alderman Barber (then lord-mayor elect), soliciting the post of chaplain to the lord-mayor for his protege, and as soon as this request was complied with, Swift wrote strongly on his behalf to Pope: 'The young man,' he wrote of Pilkington, is the most hopeful we have. A book of his poems was printed in London. Dr. Delany is one of his patrons. He is married. and had children, and makes about 100% a year, on which he lives decently. The utmost stretch of his ambition is to gather up as much superfluous money as will give him a sight of you and half an hour of your presence; after which he will return home in full satisfaction, and in proper time die in peace.' On the strength of this exordium, Pope asked Pilkington to stay with him at Twickenham for a fortnight, but subsequently had occasion, in conjunction with Bolingbroke and Barber, to remonstrate with Swift upon his lack of discrimination in recommending such an 'intolerable coxcomb.' In the same way as his wife (than whom he had far less wit), Pilkington seems to have won Swift's good graces by his seeming insensibility to the dean's occasional fits of ferocity. Thus, when Swift emptied the dregs of a bottle of claret and told Pilkington to drink them, as he 'always kept a poor parson to drink his foul wine for him, Pilkington submissively raised his glass, and would have drunk the contents had not Swift prevented him. In 1732 Swift presented to Mrs. Barber his 'Verses to a Lady who desired to be addressed in the Heroic Style,' which the lady conveyed to the press through the medium of Pilkington. When, however, some ex-pressions in the poem provoked the wrath of Walpole, Pilkington had no scruple in betraying both Barber, the printer, and Benjamin Motte [q. v.], the bookseller. This completely opened Swift's eyes as to the real character of his protégé, whom he subsequently described to Barber as the falsest rogue in the kingdom. This view of his character is confirmed by Pilkington's treatment of his wife, even if we do not accept the conjecture that he forged some offensive letters written to Queen Caroline from Dublin in 1731, and purporting to be from Swift. The latter certainly came to regard Pilkington as the author of these letters, which prejudiced him greatly in the eyes of the court, and which he warmly but uselessly disclaimed. In 1783 Pilkington inveigled Motte into issuing a counterfeit 'Life and Character of Dean Swift, written by himself,' in verse, which was a further source of annovance both to Swift and his publisher. During his year of office as chaplain to the lord mayor, Pilkington managed to extort more from his master and the aldermen than any of his predecessors (see Barber's Letter to Swift); but when his devious courses estranged influential patrons, such as Swift and Barber, he fell into evil habits and obscurity, from which he only emerged to write a few tirades against his wife. After his separation from his wife his son, John Carteret Pilkington, espoused the cause of his mother. Nothing further appears to be known about Matthew, who must be carefully distinguished from the author of the 'Dictionary of Painters,' and from Matthew Pilkington, prebendary of Lichfield, with both of whom he has been confused.

[Gent. Mag. 1748, 1749, 1750, passim; Chalmers's Biogr. Dictionary; Monck Mason's Hist. of St. Patrick's, 1820; Webb's Compendium of Irish Biography; Lady's Monthly Museum, Aug. 1812; Nichols's Lit. Illustrations; Craik's Life of Swift, pp. 443, 469; Swift's Works, ed. Hawkesworth and Scott; Pope's Works, ed. Elwin, v. 392; Baker's Biogr. Dramatica; Didot's Biographie Générale; Mrs. Pilkington's Memoirs, and various squibs relating to her husband's action for divorse in the British Museum; J. C. Pilkington's Memoirs, pp. 3-5.] T. S.

PILKINGTON, LEONARD (1527 ?-1599), master of St. John's College, Cambridge, fifth son of Richard Pilkington, lord of Rivington Manor, and Alice, daughter of Laurence Asshawe or Hassall of Charnock Heath, and brother of James Pilkington [q.v.]. was descended from an ancient Lancashire family, and received his education at St. John's College, Cambridge. He proceeded B.A. in 1543-4, and on 24 March 1545-6 was admitted a fellow of his college. In 1552 he was appointed preacher of his college, being then in deacon's orders. After the accession of Mary he was ejected from his fellowship, and fled with his brother to Frankfort, where he joined the reformed church, composed chiefly of refugees, in that city. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to Cambridge, and was a second time elected (27 Dec. 1559) senior fellow and preacher of the college. On 20 March 1560-I he was collated to the rectory of Middleton in Teesdale; and on 19 Oct. following, on his brother's promotion to the see of Durham, was elected to succeed him as master of St. John's College. In the same year he was licensed one of the university preachers, was admitted B.D., and appointed to the regius professorship of divinity. This latter appointment he resigned, however, in the following year, being, as Baker conjectures, 'either weary of the charge or not so equal to the business.' The rectory of Whitburn in the county of Durham in some measure compensated for the loss; but he took so little pains to conceal his puritan sympathies within his own college that his retention of the mastership became difficult, and when, in 1564, it became known that Elizabeth was intending to visit the university, he deemed it prudent to resign. His brother's influence obtained for him a canonry in the cathedral of Durham (1 Aug. 1567); but having failed to present himself on the occasion of a visitation by the chancellor of the diocese, he was excommunicated (6 Fob. 1577-8), although absolved a few days after. In 1581-2 he visited his college at Cambridge, and was twice entertained at the expense of the society. In 1592 he was appointed treasurer of Durham Cathedral. He died in August 1599, and his will, dated 16 Nov. 1591, was proved in the following September.

He was twice married. His first wife, Catharine, he married abroad; she died before 1559. By her he had five sons and two daughters. Of the former three survived him: Barnabas, married to Isabella Natrasse, who died in 1607; Joseph, who died in 1602-3; and Nehemiah. Of the daughters, Alice married Francis Laycock, esq.; the other, Grace, Dr. Robert Hutton, nephew of the archbishop of York. Pilkington's second wife was Jane Dyllycotes, a lady of French extraction, and the widow of Richard Barnes, D.D., who had succeeded to the see of Durham on the death of James Pilkington.

Having acquired a considerable property in Cleavedon and Whitburn, Pilkington was able to make ample provision for his family; and his will occupies four closely printed pages in Lieutenant-colonel Pilkington's 'History.' He was a benefactor both to the university library at Cambridge and to the library of his college. Although unduly biased by his puritan leanings, he appears to have been an efficient administrator. His theological attainments were probably somewhat slender; and in Baker's opinion he was 'a good preacher rather than a great divine.'

Baker's Hist. of St. John's College, ed. Mayor; Pilkington's History of the Lancashire Family of Pilkington; Cooper's Athense Cantabr. vol. ii.; Mullinger's Hist, of the University of Cambridge, vol. ii.

PILKINGTON, MARY (1766-1839) writer, the daughter of a surgeon named Hopkins, was born in Cambridge in 1700. At the age of fifteen she was left destitute by the death of her father. Hergrandfather, a clergyman, afforded her shelter, and she married in 1786 her father's successor, a surgeon named Pilkington, who resided for a while in Ely, and then accepted a position as naval surgeon. Thrown on her own resources, she became governess to a family reservedly mentioned under the initial 'W.' Here she remained eight years. Her first manuscript, 'Obedience rewarded and Prejudice conquered, or the History of Mortimer Lascelles,' was offered to Newbery in St. Paul's Churchyard, and published by him in 1797. She speedily became a voluminous author of novels and works, chiefly of an instructive and edifying character. She had a disabling illness about 1810, from which she recovered. Her later life seems to have been spent in obscurity, and she died in 1839. Mrs. Pilkington's chief publications, some of which were translated into French, were: 1. Edward Barnard, or Merit exalted, London, 1797, Barnard, or Merit exalted, London, 1797, 1801, 12mo. 2. 'A Collection of Charades and Riddles,' 1798, 12mo. 3. 'Scripture Histories,' &c., London, 1798, 12mo. 4. 'A Mirror for the Female Sex,' 1798, 12mo. 5. 'Historical Beauties for Young Ladies,' 1798, 12mo. 6. 'Teles of the Hermiteles.' 5. 'Historical Deauties for Toung Laures, 1798, 12mo. 6. 'Tales of the Hermitage,' 1798, 12mo. 7. 'Tales of the Cottage,' 1799, 12mo. 8. 'Henry, or the Foundling,' 1799, 12mo. 9. 'Marmontel's Tales collected and 12mo. 9. 'Marmontel's Tales collected and abridged,' 1799, 12mo. 10. 'Biography for Boys,' 1799, 12mo. 11. 'Biography for Girls,' 1799, 12mo. 12. 'The Spoiled Child,' 1799, 12mo. 13. 'New Tales of the Castle,' London, 1800, 12mo. 14. 'The Asiatic Princess,' 1800, 12mo. 15. 'Tales of the Cottage,' 1801, 12mo. 16. 'Tales of the Hermitage,' 1801, 12mo. 17. 'Mentorial Tales for Young Ladies,' 1802, 12mo. 18. 'Marvellous Adventures, or the Vicissitudes of a Cat.' 1802, 12mo. 19. 'New situdes of a Cat,' 1802, 12mo. 19. 'New Tales of the Castle, or the Noble Emigrant, London, 1803, 12mo. 20. Goldsmith's History of Animated Nature, abridged, 1803, 12mo. 21. 'Virtue, 12mo. 22. 'Biographi-12mo. 21. Virtue, 12mo. 22. Diographical Dictionary of Celebrated Females, 12mo. 23. 'Parental Duplicity,' 3 vols. 12mo. 24. 'Crimes and Characters, or the Outcast,' 1805, 3 vols. 12mo. 25. Violet Vale, or Stories for the Entertainment of Youth, 1806, 12mo. 26. 'The Disgraceful Effects of Falsehood,' London, 12mo, 1807. 27. 'Ellen, Heiress of the Castle,' 1807, 3 vols. 12mo. 28. 'The Calendar, or Monthly Recreations,' London, 12mo, 1807. 29. 'The Minor's Library,' 1808, vol. i. 12mo. 30. 'Sacred Elucidations, or Sunday Evening Remarks, 1809, 12mo. 31. Sinclair, or the Mysterious Orphan, 1809, 4 vols. 12mo. 32. 'The Ill-fated Mariner, or Richard the Runaway, 1809, 12mo. 33. 'A Reward for Attentive Studies, Stroud and London, 12mo, 1810 (P). 84. Characteristic Incidents drawn from Real Life,' London, 1810, 12mo. 35, 'Original Poems,' 1811, 8vo. 36. 'The Sorrows of Cæsar, or Adventures of a Foundling Dog, 1813, 12mo. 37. Margate, or Sketches Descriptive of that Place of Resort, 1813, 12mo. 38. 'Letters from a Mother to her Daughter, 12mo. 39. 'Memoirs of the Rockingham Family,' 12mo. 40. 'Evening Recreations, or a Collection of Enigmas, Charades, Riddles, &c.,' 1818, 12mo. 41, Memoirs of Celebrated Female Characters who have distinguished themselves by their Talents and Virtues in every Age and Nation, 12mo. 42. Pictures of Virtue and Vice, or Moral Tales for the Perusal of Young Gentlemen, 2 vols. 12mo. 43. 'Sacred Elucidations,' 12mo. 44. 'The Shipwreck, or Misfortune the Inspirer of Virtuous Sentiments, London, 1819, 12mo. 45. 'Celebrity, or the Unfortunate Choice,' a novel, 3 vols., London, 1825. The 'Lady's Monthly Museum' adds 'The Spoiled Child' and 'Letters from a Mother to a Daughter.

[Lady's Monthly Museum, August 1812, portrait; Biographie des Hommes Vivants, 1819, v. 64 (bibliography).]

PILKINGTON, MATTHEW (d. 1765), author. [See under PILKINGTON, MATTHOW, 1700?-1784.]

PILKINGTON, MATTHEW (1700?-1784), author of the 'Dictionary of Painters,' was born in Dublin about 1700. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, as a scholar in 1721, and graduated B.A. in 1722. Shortly afterwards he was appointed vicar of Donabate and Portrahan, co. Dublin, and occu-pied this benefice until his death about 1784.

Pilkington is known as the author of 'The Gentleman's and Connoisseur's Dictionary of Painters,' London, 1770, 4to. This useful work, the first of its kind in England, embraced about fourteen hundred artists, and continued a standard book until the appearance, 1813-16, of Bryan's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers, which was to a certain extent based upon it. In the meantime Pilkington's 'Dictionary ' had been very largely transformed in successive new editions. The first of these, 'with remarks on the present state of the art by James Barry,' and a supplement, appeared in 1798 (London, 4to). Another edition by John Wolcott, M.D., 1790,4to, was followed by a new edition with alterations and additions by Henry Fuscli, 1805, 4to, reprinted in 1810; another, revised and corrected, 2 vols. 8vo, 1824; a sixth edition, revised and corrected by Richard Alfred Davenport[q.v.], 2 vols. 8vo, 1829; a seventh, with introduction and new lives by Alan Cunningham, 1840, 8vo; again by R. Davenport, 1851, 8vo; by Cunningham and Davenport, 1852, 8vo, and 1857, 8vo. A supplement by Edward Shepard appeared in 1803.

The lexicographer is to be distinguished from the husband of Lestitia Pilkington [q. v.] and also from Matthew Pilkington, divine (1705-1765), son of Middlemore Pil-kington (1670-1752) of Stanton-le-Dale, Derbyshire, by his wife Hannah (Smith), who was baptised 25 May 1705 and graduated LL.B. from Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1728, was collated to the prebend of Ruiton in Lichfield Cathedral on 25 Jan. 1748 and died in 1765. He was author of 'A Rational Concordance, or an Index to the Bible, Notting- major-general and inspector-general of for-words not included in Priestley's 'Index to the Bible, 1805; and of 'Remarks upon several passages of Scripture, Cambridge and London, 1759, 8vo (LE NEVE, Fasti; HORNE, Bibl. Bibl. p. 133; ORME, Bibl. Bibl.; LOWNDES, Brit. Lib. 89).

[Webb's Compendium of Irish Biogr. ; Taylor's University of Dublin; Ottley's Painters and Engravers, 1875, pref.; Blackwood's Mag. xxiii. 579; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. ix. 264; Allibone's Dict. of English Lit; Brit. Mus. Cat.]

PILKINGTON, RICHARD (1568?-1631), protestant controversialist, born about 1568, was probably a nephew of James Pilkington [q.v.], bishop of Durham (see Wills, old ser. Chetham Soc. i. 82, iii. 122). He was educated at Rivington school, Lancashire, entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in April 1585, and proceeded M.A. in 1593. He was incorporated M.A. at Oxford on 31 Oct. 1599, where he proceeded B.D. on 27 June 1600, and D.D. in July 1007 as of Queen's College (Wood, Fasti, pp. 285, 322). From 27 May 1596 till his death he was rector of Hambleden, Buckinghamshire; from 1597 to 1599 rector of Salkeld, Cumberland, and of Little Kimble, Buckinghamshire, from 1620 till his death. On 13 Dec. 1609 he received the king's license to hold Hambleden rectory along with 'another' benefice (State Papers, Dom. James I, vol. 1., Docquet). From 1597 till 1600 he was archdeacon of Carlisle, treasurer of Lichfield Cathedral from 1625 till 1628, and from 1625 till his death archdeacon of Leicester.

He died in September 1631, and was buried in the chancel of Hambleden church. His wife was Anne, daughter of John May [q. v.], bishop of Carlisle.

In reply to the 'Manual of Controversies' (1614) by Anthony Champney [q. v.], Pilkington wrote 'Parallela, or the grounds of the new Roman Catholic and of the ancient Ohristian Religion out of the holy Scriptures compared together,' London, 1618, 4to. Champney answered Pilkington in 1620, and, in a prefatory epistle to Archbishop Abbot, spoke of Pilkington as 'a minion of yours, who had been induced by Abbot to begin the controversy.

[Wood's Athenes Oxon. ii. 513, and Fasti, i. 284-5, 322; Lipscomb's Buckinghamshire, ii 353, iii. 578; Tanner's Bibl. Brit.-Hib.; Le Neve's Fasti; Hist. MSS. Comm. 4th Rep. p. 409; Pilkington's Hist. of the Pilkington Family, 1894, p. 64; information from Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh of Emmanuel Coll, Cambr.]

PILKINGTON, ROBERT (1765-1834), ham, 1749, 4to, a volume containing many tifications, was born at Chelsfield, Kent, on 7 Nov. 1765. He passed through the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and obtained a commission as second lieutenant in the royal artillery on 27 Aug. 1787. He was transferred to the royal engineers on 5 June 1789, embarked for Canada in July 1790, and was stationed at Quebec. He was promoted first lieutenant on 16 Jan. 1793, captain-lieutenant on 3 June 1797, and captain on 18 April 1801. In 1794 he established a fortified post on the river Miamis in North America. He returned to England in January 1803, and was again stationed in the southern district, whence, in May, he was transferred for special service to the government gunpowder factory at Waltham Abbey Pilkington was promoted regimental lieutenant-colonel on 24 June 1809. In this year he accompanied the expedition to Walcheren, as commanding royal engineer of one of the divisions under the Earl of Chatham, and took part in the siege and capture of Flushing, where he was wounded, and in the operations under Lieutenant-generals Sir Eyre Coote (1762-1824) [q. v.] and Sir George Don [q. v.] In November and December he had charge of the work for the destruction of the basin, arsenal, and sea defences of Flushing, previous to the departure of the army, when Captain Moore and six hundred men of the royal navy were employed under his orders. Great credit was given to Pilkington in the despatch of Sir George Don for the skill with which the operations were carried out.

Pilkington returned to England in January 1810, and was stationed first at Woolwich and later at Weedon, where he superintended the erection of the large ordnance store establishment, gunpowder magazines, and barracks. In May 1815 he was appointed commanding royal engineer of the north-western district; and he was promoted regimental colonel on 1 Dec. 1815. In October 1818 he was appointed commanding royal engineer at Gibraltar, and he remained at that fortress for twelve years, having been promoted major-general on 27 May 1825. He was appointed a colonel commandant of the corps of royal engineers on 28 March 1830. when he returned to England. He succeeded General Sir A. Bryce as inspector-general of fortifications on 24 Oct. 1832, and died in London on 6 July 1834.

Pilkington married, in 1810, at Devizes, Wiltshire, Hannah, daughter of John Tylie, by whom he had four daughters and one son.

[Despatches; Royal Engineer Corps Records; War Office Records. 1 Ř. H. V.

PILKINGTON, SIR THOMAS (d. 1691). lord mayor of London, son of Thomas Pilkington of Northampton, by his second wife, Anne Mercer, and grandson of John Pilkington of Oakham in Rutland, came up to London at an early age, and was soon a successful merchant. He was a leading member of the Skinners' Company, and served the office of master in 1077, 16-1, and 1082. He attracted public notice somewhat late in life. Being a staunch whig, he was returned as one of the four city members to the short parliament which met on 6 March 1679. In the course of the debate Pilkington expressed a wish that the Duke of York might return from abroad, so that he might be impeached for high treason. He was again returned to the parliament of 1080. On 14 Dec. in the same year he was elected alderman of the ward of Farringdon Without (City Records, Repertory 86, fol. 37)

In June 1681 the citizens obtained a victory over the court party, on the election of Pilkington and Shute as sheriffs, after a hotly contested poll, by a large majority over the court candidates, Box and Nicholson. The election gave great offence to the king (cf. KINNET, History of England, 1708, iii. 401); but Pilkington braved the royal frowns, and entertained at his house the Duke of Monmouth, Shaftesbury, Essex, and other leaders of the whig party. Meanwhile the lord mayor, Sir John Moore (1620-1702) [q. v.], who led the court party in the city, gave similar entertainments to its chiefs at his house in Fleet Street (LUTTRELL, Relation of State Affairs, i. 172, 176). North stated that, on the trial of the Earl of Shaftesbury for high treason (24 Nov. 1681), Pilkington, as a whig, showed great partiality in returning the grand jury, and was reprimanded by the judges (Evamen, 1740, pt. i. chap. i. p. 3). In March 1682 he was tried at the Southwark assizes on a trivial charge of libel, but the jury brought in a verdict of 800% damages for the plaintiff (ib. p. 174). Pilkington appealed on the ground of excessive damages, and eventually the case came before the House of Lords, by whom the judgment was confirmed 3 June 1689,

At the election of new sheriffs on midsummer day 1682, Pilkington and his fellowsheriff Shute, who presided, defeated, by an exceptional exercise of their authority, the lord mayor's efforts to secure the election of the court candidates, Dudley North and Ralph Box [see under Moore, Sir John 1620-1702]. The lord mayor on the following day attended with a deputation to inform the king that the sheriffs had behaved riotously. A privy council was hastily summoned, the sheriffs were ordered to appear, and queen, with the prince and princess of and were accused of riotous conduct. Their Denmark (Martiand, History of London. trial, together with that of Lord Grey of Wark, Alderman Cornish, Sir Thomas Player, Slingsby Bethell, and others, took place on 16 Feb. in the following year. They were found guilty on 8 May, and were fined on 26 June in various sums amounting to 4,100l., Pilkington's fine being 500l. This judgment was reversed by the House of Lords on a writ of error on 17 July 1689. Pilkington's shrievalty closed on 28 Sept. 1682, when the outgoing sherill's declined to entertain, according to custom, the lord mayor at dinner (LUT-PRELL, Relation of State Affairs, i. 225). The alleged riots fomented by Pilkington and Shute were made in part the ground for suspending the city's charter by the quo war-ranto of 1683.

On laying down his office, more serious difficulties confronted Pilkington. The Duke of York had already brought against him an action of scandalum magnatum. He was charged with refusing to accompany a deputation of the corporation on 10 April 1682 to pay respect to the duke on his return from Scotland, and with saying, in the presence of Aldermen Sir Henry Tulse and Sir William Hooker, that the duke had burned the city, and was then coming to cut the citizens' throats. Damages were laid by the duke at 100,000/. The cause was tried on 24 Nov. 1682 in Hertfordshire, and the jury decided against Pilkington for the damages claimed. Pilkington thereupon surrendered to his bail, was committed to prison, and resigned the office of alderman, to which Sheriff North succeeded (City Records, Repertory 88, fol. 38 b). After an imprisonment of nearly four years he was released by the king's order towards the end of June 1686. Burnet describes him as 'an honest but indiscreet man that gave himself great liberties in discourse' (History of his own Time, 1724, i. 535).

On the flight of his old enemy, King James, and the arrival of the Prince of Orange in 1688, Pilkington soon enjoyed the royal favour. He was elected alderman of Vintry ward on 20 Feb. 1688-9, and was restored to his former place and precedence in the court of aldermen (City Records, Repertory 94, fol. 111). He was also returned as one of the city representatives in parliament. On the sudden death of Sir John Chapman, lord mayor, on 20 March 1689, Pilkington was elected for the remainder of the year. On 10 April 1689 he was knighted by the king; on Michaelmas day he was elected lord mayor for the next year; and at his installation banquet entertained the king

Denmark (MAITLAND, History of London, 1760, p. 491). The pageant was written by Matthew Taubman, the city poet, and was prepared at the cost of the Skinners' Company. A copy of this scarce little book is in the Guildhall library.

The act which reversed the judgment in quo warranto (14 May 1690) directed that a lord mayor and the principal city officers should be elected on 20 May, and should continue in office until the date at which the tenure of the office customarily determined in the following year (Hughson, i.e. Pugh, London, i. 298, 297). Accordingly, Pilkington and Sir Jonathan Raymond, a tory, were returned by the livery to the court of aldermen. who for the third time elected Pilkington lord mayor. At the beginning of December 1690 the common council complained in a petition to the House of Commons that the lord mayor and court of aldermen had encroached upon their privileges. The matter excited keen feeling in parliament, and after several heated discussions a motion for the adjournment of the debate was, to the satisfaction of all parties, carried on 11 Dec. by a majority of 197 against 184. Pilkington did not long survive his third mayoralty, dying on 1 Dec. 1691, and letters of administration of his effects were granted in January 1692.

Pilkington married Hannah Bromwich of London, by whom he had two sons. His town residence was in Bush Lane, Scott's Yard, Cannon Street (London Directory,

A portrait of Pilkington is preserved at Skinners' Hall, and is reproduced in Wadmore's 'History of the Skinners' Company. There is a contemporary engraving (1691) by R. White, from a painting by Linton, and another by Dunkarton, representing him in puritan costume, from a miniature belonging, in 1812, to S. Woodburn the publisher.

[Authorities above cited; Horbert's Hist. of the Livery Companies, ii. 325-7; Wadmore's Hist, of the Skinners' Company, 1876, pp. 68-73; Luttrell's Historical Relation of State Affairs, vol. i. passim; Notes and Queries, 3rd ser. vol. iv. p. 431; Le Neve's Pedigrees of Knights (Harl. Soc. p. 420); Gent. Mag. 1843, pt. ii. p. 226; Memoirs of Thomas Papillon, 1887 pp. 206 et seq.; Maitland's Hist, of London, 1760, pp. 476 et seq.; The Trial of Thomas Pilkington, esq. and others on Midsummer-day 1682; the Case of Sir Thomas Pilkington, Knight, now Lord Mayor, 1689; Petirion of Pilkington, Lord Mayor, and others, that they may be excepted in the act of grace touching the riot on the election of sheriffs; the three tracts last mentioned are in the Guildhall Library. Two official accounts of the sheriffs' election of 1682, with many conflicting particulars, exist, one, inspired by Lord-mayor Moore and the tory party, in the City Records (Repertory 87, fol. 209 b; Sharpe's London and the Kingdom, ii. 182-1), the other, with a strong whig bias, being the report of the parliamentary committee ot inquiry in 1689 (House of Commons' Journal, x. 156-60).]

PILKINGTON, WILLIAM 1848), architect, born at Hatfield, near Doncaster, Yorkshire, on 7 Sept. 1758, was elder son of William Pilkington of Hatfield, by his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of William Barker of Tadcaster. He adopted architecture as a profession, and was entered as a pupil with Sir Robert Taylor [q. v.], whose assistant he remained until Taylor's death. Pilkington had a large practice as surveyor and architect in London, being employed in that capacity by the board of customs (1782-1810), the parishes of St. Margaret and St. John in Westminster (1784). the Sun Fire Assurance office (1792), and the Charterhouse (1792). He was employed as surveyor and architect by the Earl of Radnor at Salisbury, where he built the townhall (1788-97) from Taylor's designs, and at Folkestone, where he built the gaol. He was also employed by the Duke of Grafion, for whom he built a house in Half Moon Street. Piccadilly. Among his public works were the custom-house at Portsmouth (1785), the transport office in Cannon Row, Westminster (1816), and the Naval Hospital at Great Yarmouth (1809-11). He occasionally exhibited designs at the Royal Academy. Pilkington retired about 1842 to his property at Hatfield, where he resided for the remainder of his life and died in 1848. He married, on 16 June 1785, Sarah, daughter and coheiress of John Andrews of Knaresborough, Yorkshire, by whom he left two sons, Henry Pilkington of Park Lane House, near Doncaster, an assistant poorlaw and tithe commissioner, and Redmond William.

The second son, REDMOND WILLIAM PIL-KINGTON (1789-1844), architect, born in July 1789, followed his father's profession as a surveyor and architect, and succeeded him in some of his posts, such as those connected with the Earl of Radnor, the Sun Fire Assurance office, and the Charterhouse. At the Charterhouse he carried out the additions commenced by his father, and left it in its present form. Pilkington was a magistrate for London, and lived in Hyde Park Gate, Kensington Gore. He purchased an estate near his father's property at Doncaster, called Ash Hill, joyed the stimulating influence of Dugald where he died, after a few days' illness, on 22 May 1844, aged 54. He married, in July 1827, Frances, daughter of Thomas Adams of Belgrave Place, London, by whom he left. one son, LIONEL SCOTT PILKINGTON, alias JACK HAWLEY (1828-1875), sportsman and eccentric, born in 1828, and educated for a short time at Rugby. One of his greatgrandfathers had been a stud-groom, and Pilkington early in life developed a strong love of stable life. On his father's death he became heir to his property, taking up his residence. when he came of age, at Ash Hill, near Doncaster, and living there all his life. Not wishing to pursue the life of a gentleman, he spent his time in the stables, on the racecourse, on the farm, or in the cattleyard and slaughterhouse. He served Sir Joseph Honry Hawley [q. v.] as groom, and, being known in the stables as 'Jack,' he adopted the surname of Hawley on settling at Doncaster, and was known as 'Jack Hawley' for the rest of his life. He was a man of education and a Roman catholic, and, in spite of his eccentric habits and appearance, was popular among his friends and neighbours. Hard drinking, however, shortened his days, and he died on Christmas-day 1875. He was buried by his direction in hunting dress, and in a grave made among some of his favourite animals, who had died of the rinderpest and been buried in a paddock near his house. He left his property to his groom, [Papworth's Dict. of Architecture, Burke's Landed Gentry, 1847; Old Yorkshire, 1882, iii. 126-8; Life and Eccentricities of Lionel Scott Pilkington, alias Jack Hawley.]

PILLANS JAMES, LL.D. (1778-1864), Scottish educational reformer, son of James Pillans, was born at Edinburgh in April 1778. His father was a printer, an elder in the 'antiburgher' secession church of Adam Gib [q. v.], and a stalwart liberal in politics. Pillans was educated at the Edinburgh High School, under Alexander Adam, LL.D. [q. v.], of whom he subsequently contri-buted a biography to the Encyclopædia Britannica.' He was second in the rector's class, the 'dux' being his close friend, Francis Horner [q. v.]; another classmato was Sir John Archibald Murray [q. v.] His father wished to apprentice him to a paper-stainer, but he had no taste for a business Proceeding to the Edinburgh Univerlife. sity, where he graduated M.A. on 30 Jan. 1801, he became a favourite pupil of Andrew Dalzel [q. v.], professor of Greek, and en-

Stewart. He attended also the chemistry • lectures of Joseph Black, M.D. [q. v.] He was a member of the 'dialectic society' founded by 'burgher' divinity students at the Edinburgh University. After graduation he acted as tutor, first to Thomas Francis Kennedy [q. v.] at Dunure, Ayrshire, next in a family in Northumberland, where he had the opportunity of speaking French. He then removed to Eton, as a private tutor. His connection with the conductors of the 'Edinburgh Review' was known to Byron, who in his 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers' inserted the taunt (line 300 of the original anonymous edition, March 1809):

And paltry Pillans shall traduce his friend.

The line was never withdrawn, though Moore, in a note to his edition of 1832, states that 'there was not, it is believed, the slightest foundation for the charge in the text.'

On the death of Adam (13 Dec. 1809), Pillans offered himself, with some misgiving, for he did not feel attracted to 'the profession of a public teacher, as a candidate for the rectorship of the Edinburgh High School, his chief opponent being Luke Adam had re-Fraser, one of the masters. commended Pillans as his successor; his whig politics stood against him with the tory town council, with whom the appointment lay; but the influence of Robert Blair [q. v] of Avontoun, the lord president of the court of session, secured his election. In January 1810 Pillans entered on his duties in the old high school, Infirmary Street, Edinburgh, with a class of 144 boys. At the outset he found it necessary to assert his authority in presence of insubordination, and for the first year he made effective use of the tawse. But he held that to rely on such aid was a sign of the teacher's incompetence, and, being a strict disciplinarian, he was soon able to dispense with it He introduced a monitorial altogether. system, then unknown in the classical schools of Scotland, and so efficient was his method, both for order and teaching, that, him with an assistant. His reputation at-He developed the teaching of Greek, which the compositions of his class, 'Ex Tentaminibus Metricis . . . in Schola Regia Edinensi . . . electa, Edinburgh, 1812, 8vo (dedicated to Joseph Goodall [q. v.], provost of Eton), was favourably noticed in the 'Edinburgh Review' (November 1812) and severely criticised by Southey in the 'Quarterly Review' (December 1812). Pillans admitted that the publication was premature, took the criticism in good part, and turned out better verse in after years. His favourite pupil was John Brown Patterson [q. v.

In 1820 the chair of 'humanity and laws' (practically Latin) in the Edinburgh university was vacated by the death of Alexander Christison, father of Sir Robert Christison, M.D. [q. v.] Pillans was elected his successor, the patronage being then vested in the lords of session, the town council, the faculty of advocates, and the society of writers to the signet. He held the chair till within a year of his death, thus occupying for over fifty-three years a prominent position, first in the scholastic, then in the academic life of Edinburgh, Robert Chambers humorously divided mankind into two sections, those who had been pupils of Pillans, and those who had not. In the conduct of his chair he adopted some of the plans of which he had proved the efficiency at the high school; but he dignified his monitors with the name of 'inspectors.' He was not freed from the task of teaching elementary Latin. for the frequenters of his junior class at the university were, as a rule, below the standard of the rector's class at the high school. He was of opinion that universities should supply elementary teaching in classics, and hencopposed, with Philip Kelland [q. v.] and others, the institution (May 1805) of an entrance examination to the junior Greek class, though he was in favour of an examination for admission to higher classes. Precision and refinement of scholarship, rather than wealth of erudition, characterised his prelections; he excelled in exact and luminous translation, and especially cultivated this power in his pupils; of com-ment he was sparing, but his illustrative though his class doubled its numbers, he matter was always terse, compact, and full declined the town council's offer to provide of point. His success lay in his power of imbuing successive generations of students tracted pupils from all parts of the world. with a living interest in Latin literature, and an appreciative taste for its beauties. had been begun by Christison in Adam's He enlarged the conventional range of time; and encouraged the study of classical authors proposed for study. Admiration for geography, always a favourite subject with the Roman literary genius inspired his lectures. It is experience at Eton led him to tures and his prefaces; he preferred Cicero cultivate Latin verse composition, which in | as an orator to Demosthenes and, as an Scotland was a lost art. A small volume of exponent of Plato, to Plato himself; ranked Livy above Thucydides, Curtius above Xenophon, while for Horace, his favourite author, he was an enthusiast. His lectures on 'universal grammar' were valuable in their day; the secondary title of his chair suggested his instructive course on 'the laws of the twelve tables.' A feature of his work was the encouragement of English recitation, for which a prize was awarded by the votes of the class; among those who gained it was Fox Maule (afterwards earl of Dalhousie) [q. v.], who joined the class when he was quartered with his regiment in Edinburgh Castle. Pillans was one of the first to teach the revised pronunciation of Latin now in some vogue, though in practice he conformed to the usual Scottish mode. He formed a class library at an expense to himself of nearly 300l. It was due to his influence that the society of writers to the signet gave annually from 1824 to 1860 a gold medal for competition in his senior class.

During his summer vacations he devoted much time to the work of making himself practically acquainted with the state of education in Scotland, and comparing it with that of other countries. At the examinations of both public and private schools, from infant schools to high schools, he was a familiar presence. He made tours for the purpose of inspecting the systems of Prussia, France, Switzerland, and Ireland. Before the committee of the House of Commons on education in 1834 he gave evidence which was minute and valuable. He was an early advocate for compulsory education. Though he wrote in defence of the just claims of classical training, his views on popular education were enlightened and broad. As president of the Watt Institution and School of Art, he inaugurated in 1854 the statue of James Watt in Adam Square (since removed to the Heriot Watt College, Chambers Street), Edinburgh.

In his later years, hints of the expediency of his retirement (which was generally expected after the passing of the Universities of Scotland Act of 1858) were met by increased labours in connection with his chair. His physique was remarkably hale. His manner, habitually measured and dignified, became slower with age; he read his lectures with the aid of a huge magnifyingglass, for he disdained spectacles. Both for facts and persons he had a wonderful memory. In the after career of his students he took a kindly and helpful interest.

He resigned at the close of his eightyfifth year, and took formal leave of the university on 11 April 1863. The degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him on 22 April. He died at his residence, 48 Inverleith Row, on 27 March 1864. He was buried on 1 April in the graveyard of St. Cuthbert's Church, Edinburgh.

The best likeness of him in old age is a photograph (1860) by Tunny of Edinburgh, taken in his tartan dressing-gown. He was rather under middle height, well built and spare, with a fine head. His ordinary costume was not academic; he often wore a white beaver hat, and always on state occasions a blue coat with brass buttons. Pillans married Helen, second daughter of Thomas Thomson, minister of Dailly, Ayrshire, sister of Thomas Thomson (1768–1852) [q.v.], the antiquary, and of John Thomson (1778–1840) [q. v.], the landscape-painter, but was early left a widower without issue.

Besides the volume of Latin verse noted above, he published: 1. 'Letters on the Principles of Elementary Teaching,' &c., Edinburgh, 1827, 8vo; 1828, 8vo; 1855, 8vo (addressed to Kennedy of Dunure). 2. Three Lectures on the Proper Objects and Methods of Instruction, &c., 1836, 8vo; Edinburgh, 1854, 8vo. 3. Eclogæ Ciceronianæ, &c., 1845, 12mo (includes selections from Pliny's letters). 4. 'A Discourse on the Latin Authors read . . . in the earlier Stages of Classical Discipline,' &c., Edinburgh, 1847, 12mo. 5. Outlines of Geography, &c., Edinburgh, 1847, 12mo. 6. Excerpta ex Taciti Annalibus,' &c., 1848, 16mo. 7. A Word for the Universities of Scotland, &c., Edinburgh, 1848, 8vo. 8. 'The Five Latter Books of the First Decade of Livy, &c., 1849, 12mo; 1857, 8vo. 9. 'The Rationale of Discipline, &c., Edinburgh. 1852, 8vo (written in 1823). 10. First Steps in the Physical and Classical Geography of the Ancient World,' &c., Edinburgh, 1858, 12mo; 10th ed. 1878, 8vo (odited by T. Fawcett); 18th ed. 1882, 8vc. 11. 'Elements of Physical and Classical Geography, &c., 1854, 8vo. 12. Contributions to the Cause of Education, &c., 1856, 8vo (dedicated to Lord John Russell; it includes reprints of Nos. 1, 2, 4, 7, and 9 above, and of articles in the 'Edinburgh Review,' minutes of evidence, &c.) 13. 'Educational Papers,' &c., Edinburgh, 1862, 12mo.

[Obituary notice in Scotsman, 29 March 1864 (ascribed to Simon S. Laurie); Memoir by an Old Student (Alexander Richardson), 1869; Catalogue of Edinburgh Graduats, 1868, p. 215; Edinburgh University Calendar, 1868, p. 182; Grant's Story of the University of Edinburgh, 1884, ii. 80, 84, 320 sq.; inscriptions from tombstones at St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh; Edinburgh, 1884, ii. 80, 84, 320 sq.; inscriptions from tombstones at St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh; information from Andrew Clark, esq., S.S.O., Leith; from the late Professor Goodhart; and from T. Gilbert, esq., registrar of Edinburgh University; personal recollection.]

PILLEMENT. JEAN(1727-1808).painter, was born at Lyons in 1727, and there commenced his artistic studies, which he completed in Paris. He was for some years employed as a designer in the (labeling manufactory, and before 1757 came to England, where he resided for some years. Pillement painted landscapes, marine pieces, and genre subjects, which he treated in a theatrical and artificial style, with bright colours and strong effects of light and shade. He worked to some extent in oil, but earned his reputation by his highly finished drawings in crayons and gouache, which, though mainly pasticei, derived from prints after Wouwermans and other Dutch artists, were suited to the taste of the day, and gained much admiration. Charles Leviez, a French dancing-master who had established himself in London and dealt largely in prints and drawings, was an extensive purchaser of Pillement's works, and employed Canot, Woollett, Ravenet, and other able engravers to reproduce them; the plates, two hundred in number, were all published in London between 1757 and 1764. and reissued in Paris by Leviez in a folio volume in 1707. Pillement exhibited with the Society of Artists in 1760, 1761, and

In the latter year he announced the sale of his pictures and drawings preparatory to his departure for Avignon on account of his health, but he probably revisited England, as he was a contributor to the Free Society's exhibitions in 1779 and 1780. He travelled much about Europe, and the latter part of his life was spent at Lyons, where he died in poverty on 26 April 1808. Examples of Pillement's work are in the Louvre and the galleries at Florence and Madrid. The engravings from his designs include 'The Four Times of the Day,' by Canot and Elliot; 'The Four Seasons,' by Canot, Woollett, and Mason; 'La Chasse au Sanglier,'by Woollett; 'La Bonne Pêche' and 'La Mauvaise Pêche,' hy P. Benazech; 'Le Gazette de Londres,' by S. F. Ravenet; four views of the environs of Flushing, by Canot; 'The Shepherdess' and 'The Villagers,' by W. Smith; and several sets of plates of flowers and decorative Chinese subjects, by J. J. Avril and others. Pillement himself etched some groups of flowers. He held the appointments of painter to Queen Marie Antoinette and Stanislas, king of Poland, IIIs son, Victor Pillement, was an able draughtsman and engraver.

[Edwards's Anecdotes of Painting; Redgrave's Dict of Artists; Chavignene's Dict. des Artistes de l'École Française; Bréghot du Lut's Biographie Lyonnaise, 1889; Nagler's Kunstler-Lexikon; Graves's Dict. of Artists, 1760-1893.]

F. M. O'D.

PILON, FREDERICK (1750-1788),actor and dramatist, was born in Cork in 1750. After receiving a fairly good education in his native city, he was sent to Edinburgh University to study medicine, but he took to the stage instead. He first appeared at the Edinburgh Theatre as Oroonoko, but with small success, and consequently joined an inferior strolling company, with which he remained for some years. He finally drifted to London, where Griffin the bookseller employed him on the 'Morning Post.' After Griffin's death had deprived him of this position, he seems to have worked as an obscure literary hack until he began to write for the stage. He was soon employed with some regularity at Covent Garden Theatre. There, on 4 Nov. 1778, 'The Invasion, or Trip to Brighthelmstone'- a moderate farce, according to Genest-was performed, with Lee Lewis in the chief part (Cameleon) on 4 Nov. 1778. It was repeated twentyfour times during the season, and was several times revived. 'The Liverpool Prize' followed at the same theatre on 22 Feb. 1779. with Quick in the chief part. 'Illumination, or the Glazier's Conspiracy,' a prelude, suggested by the illuminations on Admiral Keppel's acquittal, was acted on 12 April 1779 for Lee Lewis's benefit. 'The Device, or the Deaf Doctor,' when first produced on 27 Sept. 1779, met with great opposition, but, revived with alteration as 'The Deaf Lover,' on 2Feb. 1780, it achieved some success: 'The Siege of Gibraltar,' a musical farce (25 April 1780), celebrated Rodney's victory; 'The Humours of an Election,' a farce (19 Oct. 1780), satirised electoral corruption; 'Thelyphthora, or more Wives than One, a farce, satirising the work of the name by Martin Madan [q. v.], was produced on 8 March 1781, and was damned the second night; 'Aerostation, or the Templar's Stratagem (29 Oct. 1784), dealt with the rage of the day for balloons; 'Barataria, or Sancho turned Governor' (29 March 1785), was adapted from D'Urfey. Meanwhile Pilon deserted Covent Garden for Drury Lane, where he produced, on 18 May 1782, 'The Fair American,' a comic opera, which was not very skilfully plagiarised from the 'Adventures of Five Hours.' Pilon's last piece, a comedy, 'He would be a Soldier,'after being rejected by Colman, was performed at Covent Garden on 18 Nov. 1786, and achieved considerable success. In 1787 Pilon on 6 April Pim safely reached the vessel, only married a Miss Drury of Kingston, Surrey; just in time to relieve the sick and enfeebled he died at Lambeth on 17 Jun. 1788. His pieces were clever, if of ophemeral interest.

Besides the plays mentioned, all of which he published, Pilon issued 'The Drama,' an anonymous poem, 1775, and 'An Essay on the Character of Hamlet as performed by Mr. Henderson ' (anonymous), 8vo, London, 1785? An edition of G. A. Stevens's 'Essay on Heads' appeared in 1785, with additions by Pilon.

[Thespian Dict.; Gifford's Maviad; Baker's Biogr. Dram.; Brit. Mus. Cat.; Allibone's Dict. of English Lit.; Genest's Account of the Stage.] D. J. O'D.

PIM, BEDFORD CLAPPERTON TRE-VELYAN (1826-1886), admiral, born on 12 June 1826 at Bideford, Devonshire, was son of Lieutenant Edward Bedford Pim, who died of yellow fever off the coast of Africa in 1830, when he was engaged in the suppression of the slave trade, in command of the Black Yoke, tender to the Dryad. His mother was Sophia Soltau, oldest daughter of John Fairweather Harrison. Pim was educated at the Royal Naval School, New Cross, and entered the navy in 1842. He served under Captain Henry Kellett [q. v.] in the Herald from 1845 till 1849. In that year he was lent for duty on the brig Plover, and, wintering in Kotzebue Sound, Alaska, made a journey in March and April 1850 to Michaelovski in search of intelligence of Sir John Franklin. He reached England on 6 June 1851. In the following September he was raised to the rank of lieutenant.

At this period Pim proposed an expedition in search of Franklin to the north coast of Asia, and offered to survey the coast. After receiving a grant of 500% from Lord John Russell, unlimited leave from the admiralty, and recommendations to the authorities in St. Petersburg, he went to Russia in November 1851; but the Russian government refused to sanction his project. On board the Resolute he left England on 21 April 1852, and served under Sir Edward Belcher [q. v.] in the western division of his Arctic search expedition. In the following October, when the Resolute was in winter quarters off Melville Island, a travelling party discovered in a cairn on the island the information (placed there by McClure the previous April) that McClure's ship, the Investigator, was icobound in Mercy Harbour, Banks Land, 160 miles off. It was too late in the season to attempt a communication; but on 10 March 1853 Pim was despatched as a volunteer in charge of a sledge for Banks Land. The journey was accomplished in twenty-eight days; and crew [see McClure, Sir Robert John Le MESURIER].

In January 1854 Pim was appointed to the command of the gunboat Magpie, and did good service in the Baltic. He was wounded at the bombardment of Sveaborg on 10 Aug. 1855, for which he received a modal. In April 1857 he was appointed to the command of the Banterer in the war with China, being severely wounded at Sai Lau, Canton river, 14 Dec. 1857. He was invalided home in June 1858, and promoted to the rank of commander. In June 1859 he was appointed to the Gorgon, for service in Central America. While stationed off Grey Town he originated and surveyed the Nicaraguan route across the Isthmus, through Mosquito and Nicaragua, which now bids fair to supersede the ill-fated Panama route. While on the station he purchased a bay on the Atlantic shore, now known as Gorgon or Pim's Bay. For this he was somewhat harshly censured by the lords of the admiralty in May 1800. Returning to England in June, he retained the command of the Gorgon, and took her to the Cape of Good Hope in January 1861. On his way home he exchanged into the Fury. The following June he retired from active service; his name, however, remained on the navy list. He became captain on the retired list in 1868. Pim made three journeys to Nicaragua, in March 1863, October 1863, and November 1864, in reference to his transit scheme. After he had obtained additional concessions, in November 1860 a company, called the Nicaraguan Railway Company, Limited, was registered; but the necessary capital was not forthcoming, and it was dissolved in July 1868.

I'm now turned his attention to the law. On 20 April 1870 he entered as student of the Inner Temple, and on 28 Nov. of Gray's Inn, being called to the bar on 27 Jan. 1873. He was admitted a barrister of Grav's Inn ad cundem the following month. His practice was almost exclusively confined to admiralty cases, and he went on the western circuit. At Bristol his name became a household word among seamen. He represented Gravesend in the conservative interest in parliament from 1874 to 1880, but failed to retain the seat at the following general election. He was elected F.R.G.S. in November 1851, and an associate of the Institute of Civil Engineers on 9 April 1861. He laid before the institute, on 28 Jan. 1862, his mode of fastening armour-plates on vessels by double dovetail rivets. He was on the first council of the Anthropological Institute, 1871-4, and time of his death. He was raised to the musical automata, in imitation of singing rank of rear-admiral on the retired list in 1885. He died at Deal on 30 Sept. 1886, in his sixty-first year, and a brass tablet and window were placed in his memory at the west end of the church of the Seamen's Institute, Bristol, by the pilots of the British empire and the United States of America in 1888. He was a true-hearted sailor of the old school-brave, generous, and unselfish. Pim married, on 3 Oct. 1801, Susanna, daughter of Henry Locock of Blackheath, Kent, by whom he had two sons.

His published works include: 1. 'An Earnest Appeal . . . on Behalf of the Missing Arctic Expedition,' 1857; 5th edit. same year. 2. 'Notes on Cherbourg,' with map, 1858. 3. 'The Gate of the Pacific,' 1863. 4. 'The Negro and Jamaica,' 1866 (special No. of 'Popular Magazine of Anthropology'). 5. 'Dottings on the Roadside in Panama, Nicaragua, &c., 1869 (in conjunction with Berthold Seemann). 6. An Essay on Feudal Tenures, 1871. 7. War Chronicle: with Memoirs of the Emperor Napoleon III and of Emperor-king William I,' 1873. 8. 'The Eastern Question, Past, Present, and Future, 1877-8. 9. Gems from Greenwich Hospital,' 1881. He also contributed an article on shipbuilding to Bevan's 'British Manufacturing Industries,' 1876.

[Family papers; Foster's Men at the Bar, 1885; McDougall's Voyage of H.M.S. Resolute, 1853; Osborn's Discovery of the North-west Passage, 1856; Seemann's Voyage of H.M.S. Herald, 1853; Arctic Expedition Papers (Bluebooks), 1862-4; Inst. Civil Engineers Proc. 1861, vol. xx.; Roy. Geogr. Soc. Journal, vol. xxii. p. lxxiv, 1852, and Proceedings, 1857 and 1862; Times, 10, 14, 19, and 25 Nov. 1851, 13 Jun. 1852; United Service Mag. 1856, pp. 57, 58, 61, 68, l

PINCHBECK, CHRISTOPHER (1670?-1732), clockmaker, and inventor of the copper and zinc alloy called after his name, was born about 1670, probably in Clerkenwell, London. The family doubtless sprang from a small town called Pinchbeck in Lincolnshire. In 'Appleboo's Weekly Journal, '8 July 1721, it was announced 'that Christopher Pinchbeck, in ventor and maker of the famous astronomico-musical clocks, is removed from St. George's Court [now Albion Place], St. Jones's Lanc [i.e. St. John's Lanc], to the sign of the "Astronomico-Musical Clock" in Fleet Street, near the Leg Tavern. He maketh and selleth watches of all sorts, and clocks, as well plain, for the exact indication of time only, as astronomical, for showing the various motions and phynomena of planets remained a member of the institute up to the und fixed stars.' Mention is also made of birds, and barrel-organs for churches as among Pinchbeck's manufactures. The advertisement is surmounted by a woodcut representing an astronomical clock of elaborate construction with several dials.

Pinchbeck was in the habit of exhibiting collections of his automata at fairs, sometimes in conjunction with a juggler named Fawkes, and he entitled his stall the 'Temple of the Muses,' 'Grand Theatre of the Muses,' or 'Multum in Parvo.' The 'Daily Journal.' 27 Aug. 1729, announced that the Prince and Princess of Wales went to Bartholomew Fair to see his exhibition (cf. advertisements in Daily Post, 12 June 1729, and Daily Journal, 22 and 23 Aug. 1729). There is a large broadside in the British Museum Library (1850, c. 10, 71), headed 'Multum in Parvo,' relating to Pinchbeck's exhibition. with a blank left for the place and date, evidently intended for use as a poster. The collection of satirical prints and drawingin the print room (No. 2537) contains an engraving representing a fair, and over one of the booths is the name 'Pinchbeck.' Hiclocks are referred to in George Vertue's 'Diary' for 1782 (Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. xii. 81). No contemporary mention of his invention of the metal called after him has been discovered.

He died on 18 Nov. 1732, and was buried on the 21st in St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet Street (cf. Gent. Mag. 1782, p. 1083). There is an engraved portrait by I. Faber, after a painting by Isaac Whood, a reproduction of which appears in Britten's 'Former Clock and Watch Makers' (p. 122). His will, dated 10 Nov. 1732, was proved in London on 18 Nov.

EDWARD PINCHBECK (A. 1732), eldest son of Christopher, was born in 1713, and succeeded to his father's business, as appears by an advertisement in the 'Daily Post,'27 Nov. 1732, in which it is notified that the toys made of the late ingenious Mr. Pinchbeck's curious metal ... are now sold only by his son and sole executor, Mr. Edward Pinchbeck.' This settles the question as to the invention of pinchbeck, which is sometimes attributed to Christopher Pinchbeck, jun. Another of Edward Pinchbeck's long advertisements appears in the 'Daily Post,'11 July 1738. Both indicate the great variety of articles in which he dealt. He was baptised at St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet Street, on 7 April 1788, when his age was twenty-five, but the date of his death is not recorded.

CHRISTOPHER (1710?-1783), second son of Christopher Pinchbeck the elder, was born about 1710, and possessed great mechanical ingenuity. He was a member, and at one ingham House Cabinet.' He is called 'Pinchtime president, of the Smeatonian Society, the precursor of the Institution of Civil Engineers. In 1762 he devised a self-acting pneumatic brake for preventing accidents to the men employed in working wheel cranes, for which the Society of Arts awarded him a gold medal (Trans. Soc. Arts, iv. 188). A full description is given in W. Bailey's Description of the Machines A full description is given in in the Repository of the Society of Arts' (1782, i. 140). The brake was fitted to several cranes on the Thames wharves, and an account of an inspection of one at Billingsgate, by a committee of the Society of Arts, is given in the 'Annual Register,' 1767, pt. i.p. 90. It is recorded in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' June 1765, p. 296, that Messrs. Pinchbeck and Norton had made a complicated astronomical clock for 'the Queen's House, some of the calculations for the wheelwork having been made by James Forguson, the astronomer. There is no proof that Pinchbeck and Norton were ever in partnership, and there are two clocks answering to the description now at Buckingham Palace, one by Pinchbeck, with four dials and of very complicated construction, and the other by Norton.

which he is described as of 'Oockspur Street in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, toyman and mechanician.' The first (No. 892), granted in 1768, was for an improved candlestick, with a spring socket for holding the candle firmly, and an arrangement whereby the candle always occupied an upright position, however the candlestick might be held. In 1768 (No. 899) he patented his 'nocturnal remembrancer,' a series of tablets with Pinchbeck's son, who had bought in some of notches to serve as guides for writing in his father's trumpery,' portraits of Raleigh the dark. His patent snuffers (No. 1119, and of Prior for a guinea each. A.D. 1776) continued to be made in Birmingham until the last forty years or so, when snuffers began to go out of use. The contrivance inspired an 'Ode to Mr. Pinchbeck, upon his newly invented Candle Snuffers' by 'Malcolm MacGreggor' (i.e. William Mason), a fifth edition of which appeared in 1777. In 1774 he presented to the Society of Arts a model of a plough for mending roads (Transactions, i. 312; BAILEY, Description of Machines, &c. ii. 21). Pinchbook's name first appears in the 'London Directory' for 1778, when it replaces that of 'Richard Pinchbeck, toyman, of whom nothing is recorded. Christopher Pinchbeck was held in considerable esteem by George III, and he figures in Wilkes's 'London Museum,' ii. 38 (1770), in a 'list of the party who call themselves the king's friends, and also as a member of the Buck-beck, toyman and turner.' He seems in fact ' to have been a butt for the small wits of the day, and a writer in the 'London Evening Post, 19-21 Nov. 1772, p. 4, suggests that if the Royal Society are not Scotchified enough to elect Sir W. Pringle their president, another of the king's friends is to be nominated—no loss a person than the noted Pinchbeck, buckle and knick-knack maker to the king.' In 1776 there appeared anonymously An Elegiac Epistle from an unfortunate Elector of Germany to his friend Mr. Pinchbeck,' almost certainly by William Mason. The king is supposed to have been kidnapped and carried to Germany, and he begs Pinchbeck to assist him in regaining his liberty, suggesting among other devices that Pinchbeck should make him a pair of mechanical wings. He is also mentioned in 'Pro-Pinchbeck's Answer to the Ode from the Author of the Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers, 1776, probably also by William Mason. He died on 17 March 1788, aged 73 (Ann. Rey. 1783, p. 200; Gent. Mag. liii. 273), and was buried at St. Martin's-inthe-Fields. His will, which is very curious, is printed in full in the 'Horological Journal. November 1895. One of his daughters mar-Pinchbeck took out three patents, in all of ried William Ilebb, who was described as son-in-law and successor to the late Mr. Pinchbeck, at his shop in Cockspur Street' (imprint on Pinchbeck's portrait), and whose son, Christopher Henry Hebb (1772-1861), practised as a surgeon in Worcester (ib. new ser. xi. 687). In a letter preserved among the Duke of Bodford's papers (Hist. MSS. Comm. 2nd Rep. App. p. 14), Lord Harcourt says that in 1784 he 'hought at Westminster from

There is a portrait of Christopher Pinchbeck the younger by Cunningham, engraved by W. Humphrey.

Authorities cited, and Wood's Curiosities of Clocks and Watches, p. 121; Britten's Former Olock and Watch Makers, p. 121; Noble's Memorials of Temple Bar; Notes and Queries, 6th R. B. P. ser. i. 241.]

PINCK or PINK, ROBERT (1573-1647), warden of New College, Oxford, eldest son of Henry Pink of Kempshot in the parish of Winslade, Hampshire, by his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of John Page of Sevington, was baptised on 1 March 1572-8, and was admitted to Winchester College in 1588. Pink matriculated at New College, Oxford, on 14 June 1594, aged 19, was elected fellow in 1596, graduated B.A. on 27 April 1598, and M.A. on 21 Jan. 1601-2. In 1610 he became proctor, and in 1612 bachelor of Pink went to confer with the parliamentary medicine. In 1617 he was elected warden of commanders, and to justify his conduct, but New College, and two years later, 26 June 1619, was admitted to the degree of B.D. and D.D. From 1620 he was rector of Stanton St. John's, Oxfordshire, and perhaps of Colerne, Wiltshire, in 1645 (FOSTER, Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714, p. 1165). Pink was a close ally of Laud in his measures for the reorganisation of the university, and was one of the committee of delegates charged to draw up the new statutes (LAUD, Works, v. 84). On 12 July 1634 Laud nominated Pink to succeed Dr. Duppa as vice-chancellor, and reappointed him again for a second year in the following July (ib. pp. 100, 115). At the end of his term of office the archbishop praised him for his 'care and pains, together with his judgment in managing all business incident to that troublesome office,' which, he added, 'hath equalled the best and most careful endeavours of any of his predecessors' (ib. p. 143). In 1639 Pink assisted the vice-chancellor in the work of suppressing superfluous alchouses, a matter which had particularly engaged his attention when he had himself been vice-chancellor (ib. pp. 247, 259, 260). Laud's correspondence contains several letters to Pink on the affairs of the university or of Winchester College, and two letters from Pink to Laud are among the Tanner MSS. (ib. vi. 278, 288, 433, vii. 499; Tanner MSS. ccxxxviii. 56, 58). His injunctions with regard to the discipline and government of Winchester College are summarised in Kirby's 'Annals' of the college (p. 306). At the outbreak of the civil war Pink's loyalty at once brought him into trouble with the parliament. About the end of June 1642 Dr. John Prideaux, the vicechancellor of the university, left Oxford 'for fear of being sent for up to London by the factions (Notes and Queries, 8th ser. vii. 306). parliament 'on account of his conduct in procuring money for the king, and did not resign his office before going (Woon, Annals, ii. 442; Life of Wood, ed. Clark, i. 52). Convocation appointed Pink to discharge the vice-chancellor's duties as pro-vice-chancellor, or deputy vice-chancellor. About the middle of August Pink began to inquire into the condition of the arms in the possession of the different colleges and to drill the scholars. On 25 Aug. he held a review in New College quadrangle and proceeded to raise defences, and to attempt to persuade the city to co-operate with the university in erecting fortifications (ib. pp. 54-8; Report on the Duke of Portland's MSS. i. 57). Lord Saye and the adherents of the parliament collected forces at Aylesbury and threatened an attack on Oxford.

was sent by them to London to answer for it to parliament (Woon, Life, i. 59). Before leaving, however, he appealed to the chancellor, the Earl of Pembroke, to protect the university from the ruin which seemed about to fall on it (RUSHWORTH, v. 11). The House of Commons kept him for a time under arrest, and on 17 Nov. ordered that he should be confined at Winchester House. On 5 Jan. 1643 he was ordered to be released on bail (Commons' Journals, ii. 857, 919).

Pink soon contrived to return to Oxford for Wood describes him as procuring in 1644 rooms and employment as chaplains for Isaac Barrow and Peter Gunning, who had been expelled from Cambridge for refusing the covenant (Athenæ, iv. 140). He died on 2 Nov. 1647, and was buried in New College chapel 'between the pulpit and the screen.' In 1677 Ralph Brideoake [q.v.], bishop of Chichester, who had in his younger years been patronised by the said Dr. Pink, erected, out of gratitude, a comely monument for him on the west wall of the outer chapel.' Pink was much lamented, says Wood, 'by the members of his college, because he had been a vigilant, faithful, and public-spirited governor; by the poor of the city of Oxon because he had been a constant benefactor to them . . . and generally by all who knew the great virtues, piety, and learning of the person' (Athenæ, iii. 225). His contribution to the payment of Lydiat's debts when that learned person was imprisoned in Bocardo is an instance of his generosity [see LYDIAT, Thom is], and he also converted the chantry of Winchester College into a library at his own expense (ib. iii. 186; KIRBY, p. 169). He left books to New College Library, a legacy to the Bodleian, and many other bene-A small collection of verses 'In honour of the Right Worshipful Dr. Robert Pink' was published in 1648, containing poems by James Howell [q.v.] and others. They describe his love for learning, and, punning upon his name, term him 'the pride of Wykeham's garden, cropt to be made a flower in Paradise.

Pink was the author of: 1. 'Quæstiones Selectiores in Logica, Ethica, Physica, Metaphysica inter authores celebriores reperta,' Oxford, 1680, 4to, published by John Lamphire, principal of Hart Hall. 2. Some Latin poems. 8. 'Gesta Vicecancellariatus sui, a small manuscript volume used by Wood, which has since disappeared (Life of Wood, i. 133). Excerpts from this are found in Ballard MS. 70 (ib. iv. 144).

[Wood's Athense Oxon. cd. Bliss; Clark's three, with that of a man whom he saw at Life of Anthony Wood ; Laud's Works, Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology; Kirby's Annals of Winchestor College, 1892; a Memoir by Mr. W. D. Pink is printed in Notes and Quories, 8th ser. vii, 105.]

PINCKARD, GEORGE, M.D. (1768-1835), physician, son of Henry Pinckard of Handley Hall, Northamptonshire, was born in 1768, and after tuition by a relative, a clergyman, studied medicine first at the thon united hospitals of St. Thomas's and Guy's, then at Edinburgh, and finally at Leyden, wherehe graduated M.D. on 20 June 1792. He resided afterwards for a short time with his brother and sister at Copet, near Geneva, and witnessed the capture of the city by the French under General Montesquieu (Notes on West Indies, p. 84). On 30 Sept. 1794 he was admitted a licentiate of the College of Physicians of London. In October 1795 he was appointed a physician to the forces, and in that capacity accompanied Sir Ralph Abercromby's expedition to the West Indies. He was on the St. Domingo staff, and had many delays before starting, during which he made the acquaintance of James Lind, M.D. (1716-1794) [q.v.], then in charge of Haslar Hospital. On 15 Nov. 1795 he sailed in the Ulysses, but after a fortnight of storms had to return to Portsmouth, and finally sailed for the West Indies in the Lord Sheffield on 31 Dec. 1795, and reached Carlisle Bay, Barbados, on 13 Feb. 1796, after a stormy voyage. In his 'Notes on the West Indies' (3 vols. 1806; 2nd ed. 2 vols. 1810), which were originally written as letters to a friend at home, he describes at great length what he saw in the West Indies and Guiana, often dwelling upon the horrible incidents of blavery which came under his notice.

In 1798 he was in Ireland, and served in therebellion of that year on the staff of General llulse. He was promoted for his services to the rank of deputy inspector-general of hospitals, and had part of the direction of the medical service in the Duke of York's expedition to the Helder. On his return he took a house in Great Russell Street, afterwards moved to Bloomsbury Square, London, and resided there till his death. He established the Bloomsbury Dispensary, and was physician to it for thirty years. In 1808 was published 'Dr. Pinckard's Case of Hydrophobia,' the account of a sawyer at Chipping Barnet, Hertfordshire, aged 25, who was bitten by a dog on 14 Sept., seemed well for a few days, but on 26 Nov. developed hydrophobia, which was fatal on 28 Nov. He subsequently published in the 'London Medical Journal' two Battle Bridge, London, in 1819 in a pamphlet entitled 'Cases of Hydrophobia,' and dedicated to John Latham, M.D. [q. v.] Full descriptions of the post-mortem appearances are given in all the cases but one. He declares himself strongly in favour of immediate excision of the whole wound, or of its absolute destruction by the cautery. In April 1835 he published 'Suggestions for restoring the Moral Character and the Industrious Habits of the Poor; also for establishing District Work-farms in place of Parish Workhouses, and for reducing the Poor-rates. He recommends the cultivation of farms laid out for the purpose by the spade-labour of paupers He had long had angina pectoris, and died in an attack while writing a prescription for a patient in his consulting-room on 15 May 1835.

[Works; Munk's Coll. of Phys. ii. p 436; autograph note in one of his books in the Library of Royal Medical and Chirurgical Soc. of London.

PINDAR, SIR PAUL (1565?-1650). diplomatist, born at Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, in 1565 or 1566, was the second son of Thomas Pindar of that place, and grandson of Robert Pindar of Yorkshire. The family is said to have been long resident in Wellingborough. He was educated for the university, but, as he 'rather inclyned to be a tradesman,' his father apprenticed him at about the age of seventeen to Parvish, a merchant in London, who sent him when eighteen to be his factor at Venice. Pindar remained in Italy for about fifteen years, and by trading on commission and on his own account acquired 'a very plentiful estate.' In 1602 it was rumoured that he was acting as a banking agent in Italy for Secretary Cecil, who 'feared to have so much money in England, lost matters should not go well' (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1601-3, p. 166). From 1609 to 1011 Pindar was consul for the English merchants at Aleppo. In 1611, on the recommendation of the Turkey Company, he was sent by James I as ambassador to Turkey, and is stated (epitaph in St. Botolph's) to have been resident in this capacity for nine years, during which time he gave satisfaction by improving the Levant trade. This residence cannot, however, have been continuous, for there is evidence that he was recalled in 1616 (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1611-18, p. 408, cf. p. 587), and he was certainly in England in 1620 when, on 18 July, he was knighted by James I during his western progresses (NICHOLS, Progresses of other cases of hydrophobia, and reprinted the James I, iv. 61). His final return to England seems to have taken place in 1623, when be was offered and refused the lieutenantship of the Tower.

joining the present crypt of the church. The funeral sermon was preached by Nehemiah Rogers at St. Botolph's on 3 Sept. 1650, and Pindar brought home from the East some remarkable jewels, and when the Duke of Buckingham took Prince Charles abroad with him in February 1623, he carried off 'Sir Paul Pindar's great diamonds, promising to talk with him about paying for them' (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1819–23, p. 503). One fine diamond jewel, valued (in 1624) at 35,000l., was lent by Pindar to James I to wear on state occasions. This jewel, known as the 'great diamond,' was purchased by Charles I about July 1625 for 18,000l., though payment was deferred. It was eventually pawned in Holland for the royal service, about 1655, for the sum of 5,000l. In May 1638 Charles I procured another diamond worth 5,000l., through Pindar's agency, but payment was again deferred.

In 1624 or 1625 Pindar received (together with William Turnor) a grant from the king of the alum farm, at an annual rental of 11,000%. This manufacture had been introduced into England in the reign of James I by an Italian friend of Pindar's, and Pindar himself applied a large amount of capital in the development and support of the works. His lease of the farm appears to have expired in 1638-9, but he is found claiming rights in the farm as late as 1648 (Hist. MSS. Comm. 7th Rep. pp. 18 a, 30 b). On 6 Dec. 1626 Pindar was appointed one of the 'commissioners to arrest all French ships and goods in England,' and from 1626 till about 1641 he was one of the farmers of the customs. About March 1638-9 he lent to the exchequer 50,000l., and in a news-letter of April 1639 it is stated that his recent loans had mounted up to 100,000L, 'for this Sir Paul never fails the king when he has most need' (cf. OARIW, Hinc illæ Lachrymæ, p. 23). The money appears to have been lent to the exchequer at interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, and on the security of the alum and sugar farms and other branches of the revenue, which, however, after the death of Charles I were diverted to other uses. In 1043 and 1644 Pindar sent considerable sums in gold to the king at Oxford for 'the transportation of the queen and her children.' In 1650 he made a tender of his services to Charles II, who suggested that Pindar should be treasuror of any moneys collected in London for his service.

Pindar died at night on 22 Aug. 1650, and was buried with some pomp at St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, on 3 Sept. (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1650, p. 324) in 'a gigantic leaden coffin,' which is conspicuous in a vault ad-funeral sermon was preached by Nehemiah Rogers at St. Botolph's on 3 Sept. 1650, and a copy in manuscript is in the library of the Religious Tract Society (Mr. W. Perkins in Northampton Mercury, 12 Nov. 1881). There is a mural monument to Pindar's memory in St. Botolph's (engraved in J. T. SMIFH's Antiquities of London). He had been for twenty-six years a resident in the parish, and was vestryman in 1630 and subsequent years. He made several benefactions to St. Botolph's. and presented the communion plate. He also presented church plate to All Saints, Wellingborough, and to Peterborough Cathedral, and gave at least 10,000% for the rebuilding and embellishment of St. Paul's Cathedral (MILMAN, Annals of St. Paul's, p. 340). presented to the Bodleian Library in 1611 twenty manuscripts in Arabic, Persian, &c. (MACRAY, Annals of the Bodleian, p. 33)

By his will, dated 24 June 1646, Pindar (who never married) left one-third of his estate to the children of his nephew, Paul Pindar. Heleft legacies amounting to 9,5001., and made charitable bequests to various hospitals and prisons in and near London. Pindar's estate had been valued in 1639 by his cashiers at 236,000l., exclusive of 'desperate debts' to the king and others. At the time of his death it was found that the desperate debts predominated. His executor and cashier, William Toomes, vainly endeavoured to get in the estate, and in 1655 committed suicide, having paid none of the debts or legacies. Pindar's affairs were then taken in hand by Sir William Powell and George Carew, but the greater part of his numerous loans to noblemen, the king, and the exchequer was never recovered. Pindar's affairs were also involved with those of Sir William Courten [q. v.], and repeated attempts were made from 1653 onwards to obtain from the Dutch East India Company compensation to the amount of 151,6121 for the confiscation in 1643 and 1644 of ships belonging to Courten and his partner.

Pindar built for himself in the early part of the seventeenth century a fine mansion in Bishopsgate Street Without. In 1787, or earlier, the main portion of the house (No. 169 in the modern numbering) was used as a tavern, under the sign of the 'Sir Paul Pindar's Head' (sign engraved in Gent. Mag., 1787, pt. i. p. 491); it was pulled down in 1890, and the carved oaken front is now in the Architectural Court at South Kensington Museum. The fine panelling and richly ornamented ceilings of Pindar's house, though since 1810 much mutilated, were long the admiration of London antiquaries. Views of the house may be seen in Walford's 'Old and New London,' ii, 151 (after J. T. Smith, 1810), and in Hugo's 'Itinerary of Bishopsgate.'

Pindar's portrait was pointed during his residence in Constantinople, and was engraved by John Simco in 1794. Pindar's name is sometimes spelt 'Pyndar' and 'Pindar'. The last-named spelling occurs in the family pedigree in the 'Visitation of London,' 1083 (Harleian Soc. Publ. xvii. 106).

[Carew's Hine ille Lacryme, 1681; Browne's Vox Veritalis, 1683; Lex Talionis, 1682; Calondars of State Papers, Dom. and Colonial Ser; Allen's Hist. of London, iii. 165, 166; Bidges's Northamptonshire; Notes and Queries, 4th ser. xii. 287, 6th ser. xi. 415, xii. 10, 116, 7th ser. xii. 26, 98, 197; Northamptonshire Notes and Queries, 1886, i. 159, 160; Hugo's Illustrated Queries, 1886, i. 159, 160; Hugo's Illustrated Linerary of the Ward of Bishop-gate; Brit. Mus. Cat.; authorities cited above; information from Mr. Arthur E. Wroth.]

PINDAR, PETER (1738-1819), satirist. [See Wolcot, John.]

PINE, SIR BENJAMIN CHILLEY CAMPBELL (1809–1891), colonial governor, the son of Benjamin Chilley Pine of Tunbridge Wells, Kent, was born in 1809. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, B.A. in 1833 and M.A. in 1840. He was admitted to Gray's Inn, 9 June 1831, 'aged 22,' and was called to the bar in 1841. In the same year he became queen's advocate at Sierra Leono.

In 1848 he acted temporarily as governor of Sierra Leone, and displayed much military capacity. He was present at the expedition to the Sherbro River, and helped to destroy a strong stockaded fort, whence the natives had harried the neighbourhood. In the following year his vigorous policy put an end to the civil war in the same district.

This success led to his appointment in 1849 as second governor of the infant colony of Natal. During the Kaffir war in the south-west he preserved peace within his territory, and received the thanks of the home government. In 1855 he led a force of volunteers against the Amabi cas and enforced their submission. In 1856 Pine returned to the west coast as governor of the Gold Coast Colony, and was knighted. In May 1859 he went to the less trying climate of St. Christopher, West Indies, as lieutenant governor.

At that time each of the Leeward Islands, of which St. Christopher's formed part, was governed practically as a separate colony in a loose confederation, with a governor-in-chief at Antigua. Pine recommended that the government should be made federal, with a central authority at Antigua. In 1866 he was temporarily acting as governor of Antigua, and helped to persuade the legislature to reform the constitution. He did the same in his own island of St. Christopher. The home government adopted his views, and in February 1869 he was appointed governorin-chief of the Leeward Isles, with a mandate to carry out his scheme. On 23 June 1870, in an exhaustive address, he laid his project before the council of Antigua, and in the course of the year carried it in all the islands. He was thus the first governor under the federal constitution of the Leeward Islands. He was made a K.C.M.G. in June 1871 for his services. In 1873, before he had finished his term as governor-inchief at Antigua, he was sent back to his old colony of Natal. He retired on a pension in 1875.

Pine was made a bencher of Gray's Inn in 1880, and acted as its treasurer in 1885. He died on 27 Feb. 1891 at his residence in Wimpolo Street, London.

He was twice married: first, in 1841, to Elizabeth, daughter of John Campbell, who died in 1847; secondly, in 1859, to Margaretta Anne, daughter of Colonel John Simpson of the Bengal army.

Pine, who was a rhetorical speaker and writer, was the author of articles on the African colonies in the Encyclopædia Britannica.'

[Colonial Office List, 1875; Times, 2 March 1891; Colonial Office Records; Luard's Graduati Cantab. (1818-1885), p. 319; Foster's Gray's Inn Admission Registers; personal knowledge.] C. A. H.

PINE, JOHN (1690-1756), engraver, born in 1690, practised as an engraver in London. His manner was dry and formal, but of great precision and excellence, resembling that of Bernard Picart, the great French engraver at Amsterdam. It seems probable that Pine was Picart's pupil, since among his earliest works are the illustrations from Picart's designs to 'Jonah,' a poem published in 1720. Pine's first work of importunce was a series of large and important engravings entitled 'The Procession and Ceremonies observed at the Time of the Installation of the Knights Companions of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath upon Thursday, June 17, 1725,' &c. These plates, which contain portraits of the knightand their esquires from drawings by Joseph Highmore [q. v.], were published in 1780 by Pine, with an introductory text in French and English. In 1733 Pine published a facsimile engraving of the 'Magna Charta' deed in the Cottonian Library, and in the same year the first volume of a remarkable engraved work. Pine was also one of the enterprise in engraving. This was a complete edition of the works of Horace, illustrated from gems and other antiquities, and the whole work engraved on copper plates; the second volume was published in 1737, and this edition has maintained its popularity up to the present day. In 1739 Pine published another work of great interest, entitled 'The Tapestry Hangings of the House of Lords, representing the several engagements between the English and Spanish Fleets in the ever-memorable Year MDLXXXVIII,' with portraits, charts of the coasts of England, medals, &c. As these valuable tapestries, executed by H. C. Vroom to commemorate the defeat of the Spanish armada, were subsequently destroyed by fire, Pine's engravings, done from drawings by C. Lempriere, are of the greatest historical value. Pine resided for some time in Old Bond Street, and later had a print-shop in St. Martin's Lane. 1743 he was appointed Bluemantle pursuivant-at-arms in the Heralds' College, and appears to have taken up his residence there. In 1746 he published a large and important 'Plan of London,' in twenty-four sheets on a scale of about nine inches to a mile, from a survey by John Rocque, commenced in 1737; an index to the streets, &c., in this survey, was published in 1747. In 1749 Pine published, besides a copy of the illuminations to the charter of Eton College, two important views (1742) of the interiors of the House of Peers, with the king on the throne, and the House of Commons, with the speaker (Onslow) in the chair, and Sir Robert Walpole addressing the house. These engravings contain numerous portraits. In 1753 Pine published the first volume of an edition of 'Virgil,' containing the Bucolics and Georgics, printed in ordinary type, with illustrations similar to those in his edition of 'Horace;' but the second volume was never published. In 1755 he published a second 'Plan of London' in eight sheets, on a smaller scale than the one already mentioned. Pine appears to have been a stout, jovial man, and was a well-known and Mrs. Yates (whole length) as Meden member of Old Slaughter's Club. He was a (engraved in mezzotint by W. Dickinson), member of Old Slaughter's Club. He was a personal friend of William Hogarth [q. v.], who painted his portrait (engraved in mezzotint by J. McArdell), in the manner of Rembrandt, and introduced another portrait of him, as a fat friar, in 'The Gate of Calais,' published in 1749; from this latter circumstance Pine obtained the nickname of 'Friar governors of the Foundling Hospital, and held the office of 'engraver to the King's Signet and Stamp Office.' In 1755 he was one of the committee who attempted to form a royal academy, but he did not live to see the plan succeed, as he died on 4 May 1756. He left two sons-Simon Pine, who became a miniature-painter at Bath, and died in 1772: and Robert Edge Pine, who is noticed separately—and a daughter Charlotte, whose portrait was also painted by Hogarth.

Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Austin Dobson's William Hogarth; Pine's own publications; Somerset House Gazette, No. 1; Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting, ed. Wornum.] L. C.

PINE, ROBERT EDGE (1730-1788), painter, born in London in 1730, was son of John Pine [q.v.], the engraver, who probably gave him his first lessons in art. Robert soon devoted himself to history and portraitpainting, and obtained much success, especially in the latter branch of art. He painted portraits of numerous members of the theatrical profession, one of his earliest works being Thomas Lowe and Mrs. Chambers as Captain Macheath and Polly,' engraved in mezzotint by J. McArdell in 1752. He was a contributor to the first exhibition of the Society of Artists in 1760, sending 'A Madwoman' (a favourite subject of his), a fulllength portrait of Mrs. Pritchard as Hermione, and a large painting of 'The Surrender of Calais to Edward III.' For the last picture he obtained the premium of one hundred guineas awarded for the first time by the Society of Arts (see Gent. Mag. 1760, p. 198), a success which he repeated in 1763 (ib. 1763) with 'Canute rebuking his Courtiers on the Seashore.' This he exhibited with the Society of Artists at the king of Denmark's exhibition in 1768. Both these pictures were engraved by F. Aliamet, and the former was purchased by the corporation of Newbury in Berkshire. He continued to exhibit with the Society of Artists, sending, among other portraits, one of Samuel Reddish as Postuntil 1771, when, in consequence of an insult by the president, he erased his name from the list of members, and in 1772 exhibited at the Royal Academy. He had hitherto resided in St. Martin's Lane, in a house opposite New Street, Covent Garden, and among his pupils was John Hamilton Mortimer Pine.' He was associated with Hogarth, [q. v.]; but on his brother Simon's death in Lambert, and others in the petition which 1772 at Bath, he went thither, and resided resulted in the passing of the act to protect there for some years. He exhibited again at the Royal Academy in 1780, sending a portrait of Garrick, perhaps the one painted at Bath for Sir Richard Sullivan, and now in the National Portrait Gallery (engraved in mezzotint by W. Dickinson), and for the last time in 1784, when he sent portraits of Lord Amherst and the Duke of Norfolk, and a large painting of 'Admiral Rodney in Action on board the Formidable, which, after various wanderings, has found a home in the townhall at Kingston, Jamaica (see the Daily Gleaner, 2 Aug. 1893, and the Columbian Magazine, Kingston, for November 1797). Pine displayed a considerable amount of sympathy with Wilkes and the so-called patriots. He painted more than one portrait of Wilkes, which remain the most satisfactory likenesses of that demagogue, were engraved in mezzotint by W. Dickinson and J. Watson, Whon and have been frequently copied. Brass Crosby [q. v.], the lord mayor, and Aldermen Wilkes and Oliver were committed to the Tower in 1771, Pine visited them, and painted their portraits while in captivity, those of Crosby and Oliver being also engraved by W. Dickinson. Pine is said to have painted four portraits of Garrick, and a large allegorical composition of 'Garrick reciting an Ode to Shakespeare,' by Pine, was engraved in stipple by Caroline Watson. Pine painted a series of pictures to illustrate Shakespeare, and in 1782 held an exhibition of them in the Great Room at Spring Gardens, which was, however, by no means successful; some of these Shakespearcan pictures were engraved by Caroline Watson and others. Among the numerous portraits painted by Pine before this date were a full-length of George II, painted from memory in 1759 (now at Audley End), and a full-length of the Duke of Northumberland for the Middlesex Hospital,

In 1783, after the declaration of independence by the States of America, Pine, not meeting with sufficient support in London, determined to go to America, in the hope of painting the portraits of the principal heroes of the American revolution, as well as commemorative historical pictures. settled with his wife and children in Philadelphia, where she kept a drawing-school. Pine was furnished with an introduction to Francis Hopkinson, whose portrait was the first which he painted in America, and who gave him a letter of recommendation to George Washington. Pine painted Washington's portrait in 1785, and also others of the family at Mount Vernon, where he resided for three weeks. Ilis portrait of Washington was engraved as a frontispiece to Washington Irving's 'Life of Washington,' and passed eventually into the possession of Mr. Henry Brevoort of Brooklyn, U.S. Pine obtained considerable employment as a portrait-painter in America, and painted several family groups. Robert Morris, George Read. and Thomas Stone were among his sitters, and a fine portrait of Mrs. John Jay belongs to her grandson, John Jay, of New York, U.S.A. Among the paraphernalia of his art which he took from England was a plaster cast of the Venus de' Medici, which he was obliged to keep enclosed in a box, it being the first specimen of a nude statue which had been seen in America. Pinedied suddenly of apoplexy at Philadelphia on 18 Nov. 1788. He is described as a very small man, morbidly irritable. After his death his widow obtained leave from the legislature of Pennsylvania to dispose of his pictures by lottery. A large selection of his historical works were preserved in the Columbian Museum at Boston, U.S., where they were seen and studied by the painter, Washington Allston, when young, who said that he was much influenced by Pine's colouring. They all, however, perished when that institution was burned.

[Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Edwards's Anecd. of Painting; Dunlup's Hist. of the Arts of Design in the United States; Appletou's Cyclopædia of American Biogr.; Chaloner Smith's British Mezzotinto Portraits; Baker's Engraved Portraits of Washington; Catalogues of the Soc. of Artists and Royal Academy.] L. C.

PINGO, LEWIS (1743-1830), medallist, son of Thomas Pingo [q. v.], medallist, was born in 1743. In 1763 he was a member of the Free Society of Artists, and in 1776 was appointed to succeed his father as assistantengrayer at the mint. From 1779 till his superannuation in 1815 he was chief engraver. Pingo engraved the dies for the shillings and sixpences of George III in the issue of 1787 (HAWKINS, Silver Coins, p. 411), and the second variety of the Maundy money of George III (ib. p. 416). He also engraved dies for the three-shilling Bank token and for the East India Company's copper coinage (Gent. Mag. 1818, pt. i. p. 180). He made patterns for the guinea, seven-shilling piece (OROWTHER, English Pattern Coins, p. 36), ponny and halfponny of George III (Mon-TAGU, Copper Coins, p. 105). Among Pingo's medals may be noticed: medal of Dr. Richard Mead, struck in 1773 (HAWKINS, Medallic Illustr. ii. 675); the Royal Society Copley medal, with bust of Captain J. Cook, 1776 Freemasons' Hall medal, 1780; 'Defence of Gibraltar,' 1782 (Cochran-Patrick, Medals of Scotland, p. 108); Christ's Hospital medal, reverse, open bible; medal of William Penn

(HAWKINS, op. cit., ii. 348). His medals are Several of the above-named medals were · signed L. P. and L. PUNGO.

Pingo died at Camberwell on 26 Aug. 1830, aged 87 (Gent. Mag. 1830, pt. ii. p. 283).

[Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Hawkins's Medallic Illustrations, ed. Franks and Grueber; Ruding's Annals of the Coinage, i. 45.]

PINGO, THOMAS (1692-1776), medallist, was born in Italy in 1692, and came to England about 1742-5. He was a skilful and industrious worker, and made a large number of English medals, chiefly between 1745 and 1770. His usual signature is T. PINGO. In 1763 he was a member of the Free Society of Artists. He engraved a plate of arms for Thoresby's 'Leeds' (WALFOLE, Anecdotes, iii. 984), and in 1769 modelled for Wedgwood representations of the battles of Plessy and Pondicherry. He also worked IIe was assistantfor Thomas Hollis. engraver at the English mint from 1771 till his death, which took place in December 1776

(Gent. Mag. 1776, p. 579).

The following is a selection from Pingo's medals: I. The 'Captain Callis' medal, 1742 (engraved in HAWKINS, Medallio Illustr. ii. (engraved in HAWKINS, Medalta Illustr. ii. 569). 2. Medal of One of the Loyal Associations, '1745f' (ib. ii. 603). 3. 'Repulse of the Rebels,' 1745 (ib. ii. 607). 4. 'Defeat of the French Fleet off Cape Finisterre,' with bust of Anson, 1747 (ib. ii. 634). 5. Medal relating to Dr. Charles Lucas, 1749 (engraved, ib. ii. 654). 6. The 'Oak Medal' of Prince Charles, 1750 (ib. ii. 655). The engraving of the dies cost 88/16s. 7 Prize graving of the dies cost 88/. 16s. 7. Prize Medal of St. Paul's School, obv. bust of Colet, rev. Minerva seated, 1755. 8. 'Victory of Plassy,' 1758. 9. 'Society for Promoting Arts and Commerce, 1758. The dies cost eighty guineas (H. B. WILDATLEY, Medals of the Soc. of Arts, p. 3). 10. 'Capture of Louisburg' medals, 1758 (HAWKINS, op. cit. ii. 685-6). 11. 'Capture of Gorce,' 1758. This medal gained the prize of the Society of Arts for the best specimen commemorating the event. 12. 'Capture of Guadeloupe,' 1759 (designed by Stuart). 13. 'Majority of the Prince of Wales,' 1759.
14. 'Battle of Minden,' 1759 (engraved, HAWRINS, op. cit. ii. 700). 15. 'Taking of Quebec,' 1759. 10. 'Taking of Montreal,' 1760. 17. 'Subjugation of Canada,' 1760. 18. Coronation medal of Stanislaus Augustus of Poland, 1764 (made in London, HUTTUN-CZAPSKI, Catal. ii. 74). 19. 'Repeal of the Stamp Act,' with bust of Chatham, 1766. Lord - chancellor Camden, 1766.
 Royal Academy medals, reverse, Minerva and Student; and reverse, Torso, 1770. VOL. XV.

made by Pingo for the Society of Arts, under the auspices of Thomas Hollis and from designs by Cipriani.

There is a mezzotint portrait (1741) of Pingo in 1738, i.e. at the age of forty-six, by Carwitham, after Holland (BROMLEY, Cat.

of Portraits, p. 471

Pingo married Mary (d. 17 April 1790), daughter of Benjamin Goldwire of Romsey, Hampshire, and had by her several children, of whom Lewis [q. v.], John, and Benjamin attained distinction.

JOHN PINGO (A.1770) was appointed assistant-engraver to the mint in 1786 or 1787, and in 1768 and 1770 exhibited medals and wax models with the Free Society of Artists.

BENJAMIN PINGO (1749-1794), the fifth son, baptised 8 July 1749 in the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, was appointed rougedragon pursuivant in 1780, and York herald in 1786. He was killed in a crush at the Haymarket Theatre on 3 Feb. 1794 (Ann. Reg. 1794, p. 5). He bequeathed his manuscripts to the College of Arms, and his books were sold by Leigh & Sotheby in 1794 (NI-CHOLS, Lit. Illustr. vi. 356, 857; NOBLE, College of Arms, p. 426).

[Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Hawkins's Medallic Illustrations, ed. Franks and Grueber; Ruding's Annals of the Coinage, i. 45; Meteyard's Life of Wedgwood, i. 442, ii. 92.

PINK, CHARLES RICHARD (1853-1889), architect, son of Charles Pink, was born on 4 July 1853 at Soberton in Hampshire. In 1871 he was articled for four years to Thomas Henry Watson. In 1873-4 he attended Professor T. Hayter Lewis's classes of fine art and construction at University College, London, carrying off the first prizes in ancient and mediaval art, and the second in ancient and modern construction. In 1875 he returned to Winchester, where he was employed in designing the Chilworth and North Baddesly schools. In 1876 he became an associate of the Institute of British Architects. He designed a number of houses and schools, and a few churches, mostly in Hampshire. Pink was especially well versed in architectural heraldry, his taste for which appears in his sketches, some of which were reproduced after his death in a little vo-lume called the 'Pink Memorial;' they are spirited and graceful. He published 'Notes on Heraldry' in 1884, and a paper on 'Archi-tectural Education' in 1886. In the professional education of architects he took the keenest interest. He served on the committee of the Architectural Association till 1885, when he was elected president, and in 1886 he was elected fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects. He died at Hyde, near Winchester, on 25 Feb. 1889, while still actively engaged in professional work.

[Obituary notices in Building News and Journal of Proc. of Royal Institute of British Architects, new ser. v. 172, 314 (by Thomas Henry Watson); Pink Memorial; Brit. Mus. Cat.; private information.]

PINK, ROBERT (1573-1647), warden of New College, Oxford. [See PINCK.]

PINKE, WILLIAM (1599?-1029), author, born in Hampshire, was probably one of the Pinkes of Kempshot, Winslade, and related to Robert Pinck or Pink [q. v.], the warden of New College, Oxford. Me entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, as a commoner in Michaelmas term 1615, and graduated B.A. on 9 June 1619, M.A. 9 May 1622. He took holy orders, and became tutor or 'reader' to George Digby, second earl of Bristol [q. v.] He was also appointed philosophy reader o Magdalen, and was elected a fellow in 1628. He was known as an excellent classical scholar and linguist. He died in February 1629, before the promise of his abilities was fulfilled, and was buried in Magdalen College chapel. He is described as a thoroughgoing puritan.

Ho wroto: 'The Tryal of a Christian's syncere loue vnto Christ,' edited, with a dedication to Lord George Digby, by William Lyford [q.v.], Oxford, 1680, 4to; 1631, 4to; 1684, 12mo; 1636, 16mo; 1687, 12mo; 1659, 12mo; the first edition of this work contains two sermons, the second and all subsequent editions contain four. He was also author of 'An Examination of those Plausible Λ ppearances which seeme most to commend the Romish Church and to prejudice the Reformed, Oxford, 1626; this is a translation of the 'Traité auquel sont examinez,' &c., La Rochelle, 1617, by John Cameron (1679?—1625) [q.v.] Wood mentions a dedication to the master of the Skinners' Company, which is not in the copy at the British Museum. Pinke also left numorous manuscripts.

[Wood's Athense Oxon. ii. 475, and Fasti, i. 386, 406; Brook's Lives of the Puritans, ii. 365; Wood's Hist. Antiq. Oxon. ed. Gutch, App. p. 272; Clarke's Indexes, iii. 375, Bloxam's Magd. Coll. Reg. v. 88; Madan's Early Oxford Press Oxf. Hist. Soc.), pp. 130, 157-8, 179, 193; Alumni Oxon. early ser, iii. 1166; a first edition of his Sermons is in Dr. Williams's Library.]
C. F. S.

PINKERTON, JOHN (1758-1826), the second part of 'II ardy Kanute,' and also Scottish antiquary and historian, born at gave alist of other ballads which were in great Edinburgh on 17 Feb. 1758, claimed descent part his own composition, affirming at the from an old family originally settled at same time that he had never directly as-

Pinkerton, near Dunbar, but no complete account of the steps of the descent is given. His grandfather Walter was a yeoman or small farmer at Dalserf, Lanarkshire; and his father James, after following with some success the trade of a dealer in hair in Somerset, settled in Edinburgh, where he married a widow, Mrs. Bowie, whose maiden name was Heron, and who was the daughter of an Edinburgh merchant. The antiquary, their third son, received his early education at a small school in the suburbs of Edinburgh, and from 1704 to 1710 attended the grammar school of Lanark, then taught by Mr. Thomson, brother of the author of 'The Seasons.' On his return to Edinburgh he expressed a strong desire to enter the university there, but to this his father objected; and after devoting some time to private study, especially of French and mathematics, he was articled to William Ayton, a writer to the signet in Edinburgh, with whom he remained for five years. While still an apprentice with Ayton he published anonymously, in 1776, a small poem of no great merit, entitled 'Craigmillar Castle: an Elogy,' which he dedicated to Dr. Beattie.

l'inkerton completed his apprenticeship in 1780, but his father's death in the same year led to his abandonment of the profession of law; and, in order to obtain access to books of reference, he removed, towards the close of 1781, to London. The same year he published a volume of miscellaneous poetry which he entitled 'Rimes,' and which consisted of four varieties: 'melodies, symphonics, odes, and sonnets;' in 1782, 'Two Dithyrambic Odes: (1) On Enthusiasm; (2) On Laughter;' and in the same year 'Tales in Verse.' Although his verses indicate a facile command of a variety of metres, they possess no distinct poeticquali-tics. In 1783 he published 'Select Scotish Ballads' with the sub-title' Hardy Knute: an Heroic Ballad, now first published complete; with other nine approved Scotish Ballads and some not hitherto made public, in the Tragic style. To which are prefixed two 'Dissertations: (1) on the Oral Tradition of Postry; (2) on the Tragic Ballad.' Under the pseudonym of 'Anti-Scot,' Ritson, in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for November 1784 (pp. 812-14), demonstrated that the second part of 'Hardy Kanute,' and a considerable number of the other so-called ancient ballads of Pinkerton were modern; and in the preface to his 'Ancient Scotish Poems' (pp. exxviii-exxxi) Pinkerton confessed himself the author of the second part of 'Hardy Kanute,' and also gave a list of other ballads which were in great part his own composition, affirming at the serted their antiquity, but had purposely expressed himself with ambiguity. He seems to have been influenced chiefly by exaggerated notions of his own literary abilities; but it is perhaps worth noting that, while himself a literary forger, he expressed his belief in the authenticity of the Shakespeare papers forged by Ireland (cf. NIOHOLS. Plustr.

of Lit. iii. 779).

In 1784 Pinkerton published anonymously an Essay on Medals, in two volumes: a valuable work, which originated in a manual and tables originally made for his own use. and gradually enlarged. In the final preparation of the work for publication he had the assistance of Francis Douce [q. v.] and Mr. Southgate of the British Museum. A third edition appeared in 1808. Under the name of Robert Heron (the surname of his mother), Pinkerton published, in 1785, a somewhat eccentric volume, entitled 'Letters of Literature,' in which, besides recommending a new method of orthography, he expressed very depreciatory opinions of the classical authors of Greece and Rome. The work has been ascribed to Robert Heron [q. v.], miscellaneous writer; but the coincidence of the name was mere accident, and the statement that it injuriously affected Heron's prospects can scarce be accepted, as Heron was then quite unknown. The book led to an acquaintance with Horace Walpole, who introduced Pinkerton to Gibbon the historian. Gibbon is said to have formed a high estimate of Pinkerton's learning and historical abilities, and to have recommended him as translator and editor of a proposed series of 'English Monkish Historians;' the project which then came to nothing was attempted by Henry Petrie [q. v.] After the death of Walpole, Pinkerton sold a collection of his remarks and letters to the proprietors of the 'Monthly Magazine, and in 1799 they were published in two small volumes under the title 'Walpoliana.'

In 1786 Pinkerton rendered an important service to Scottish literature by bringing out two volumes of 'Ancient Scotish Poems never before in print. But now published from the MS. Collections of Sir Richard Maitland of Lethington, Knight, and Lord Privy Seal of Scotland, and a Senator of the College of Justice, comprising pieces written from about 1420 till 1586, with large Notes and a Glossary.' Prefixed to the volumes were an 'Essay on the Origin of Scotish Poetry' and a 'List of all the Scotch Poets, with Brief Remarks;' and an appendix was added, 'containing among other articles an account of the Maitland and Bannatyne MSS.' Nichols (Illustr. of Lit. v. 670) and, following him, Robert

Chambers (Eminent Scotsmen) affirm this work to have been also practically a forgery; and describe the manuscripts as feigned to have been discovered in the Pepysian Library, Cambridge.' They of course were then, and still are, in the Pepysian Library [see MAITLAND, SEE RICHARD, LORD LETHINGTON]. In 1787, under the name of H. Bennet, M.A., Pinkerton published 'The Treasury of Wit,' being a methodical selection of about 'Twelve Hundred of the Best Apophthegms and Jests from Books in several Languages,' with a 'Discourse on Wit and Humour.' The same year appeared his 'Dissertation on the Origin and Progress of the Scythians or Goths. being an Introduction to the Ancient and Modern History of Europe.' The value of the work is by no means commensurate with its grandiloquent title. Its chief purpose was to expound his peculiar hypothesis as to the inveterate inferiority of the Celtic race. He affirms that the 'Irish, the Scottish highlanders, the Welsh, the Bretons, and the Spanish Biscayans' are the only surviving aborigines of Europe, and that their features, history. actions, and manners indicate a fatal moral and intellectual weakness, rendering them incapable of susceptibility to the higher influences of civilisation. Throughout the work facts are subordinated to preconceived theories. In 1788 he contributed to the 'Gentleman's Magazine' a series of twelve letters on the 'Cultivation of Our National History.' In 1789 he published a collection of 'Ancient Lives of the Scottish Saints,' a new edition of his work on 'Medals,' and a new edition of Barbour's poem of 'The Bruce.' In 1790 appeared his 'Medallic History of England till the Revolution, and an Inquiry into the History of Scotland preceding the Reign of Malcolm III, or 1056, including the authentic History of that Period,' a work of considerable original research. In 1792 he edited in three volumes 'Scotish Poems reprinted from Scarce Editions.' In 1797 he delivered 'to the public candour' what he termed the greatest labour of his life: 'The History of Scotland from the Accession of the House of Stuart to that of Mary, with Appendices of Original Documents, in two volumes, with portraits of the author. Notwithstanding the combined tameness and pomposity of its style, the work is still of considerable value as an historical authority, and indicates very thorough and painstaking research. majority, but not all, of the original documents in the appendix are now included in one or other of the later historical collections. In connection with the preparation of the work, Pinkerton, on the recommendation of Archibald Constable the publisher

4 H 2

(cf. CONSTABLE, Correspondence, i. 22), employed William Anderson, an Edinburgh lawyer, to make transcripts from the Advocates' Library and the public records. In Appendix No. xxiii. to the 'History' Pinkerton published a 'Paper on the Present State of the Public Records,' which he said was written by Anderson, and some of the statements in which he professed to corroborate by affirming that the expense of examining these records was 'enormous, to judge from the attorney's bill, which exceeded twelve pounds for a trifling labour, which in England would have been richly recompensed by three or four guineas.' This called forth a pamphlet by Anderson, entitled 'An Answer to an Attack made by John Pinkerton, Esqr., of Hampstoad, in his "History of Scotland," lately published, upon William Anderson, writer in Edinburgh, containing an account of the Records of Scotland, and many Strange Letters of Mr. Pinkerton, accompanied with suitable Comments,' Edinburgh, 1797. Anderson also commenced a suit against Pinkerton to obtain payment of his fees, arrested some of his rents to compel payment in Scotland, and compelled payment of the costs of the suit.

In 1797 Pinkerton published 'Iconographia Scotica, or Portraits of Illustrious Persons of Scotland;' and in 1799 'The Scotish Gallery; or Portraits of Eminent Persons, with their Characters.' These are entirely distinct works, the former being mainly con-They are cerned with royal personages. chiefly of value for the portraits, many of them engraved for the first time from those in private collections. His subsequent works were somewhat miscellaneous in character: 'Modern Geography digested on a New Plan,' 2 vols. 1802, 2nd edit. 3 vols. 1807; 'Re-collections of Paris,' 2 vols. 1806; 'General Collection of Voyages and Travels, 17 vols. 4to, 1807-14; 'New Modern Atlas,' in parts, 1808-9; and 'Petrology, or a Treatise on the Rocks, 1811. The 'Collection of Voyages and Travels' was a useful compilation in its day, being the most voluminous that had hitherto appeared, with the exception of the French 'Histoire Générale des Voyages' (Paris, 1785), which had occupied twentyfour bulky quarto volumes. A large number of very rare volumes of travels were incorporated, and the average merit of the plates was considerable.

Pinkerton was for some time editor of the 'Critical Review.' In 1814 he republished, in two volumes, his 'Inquiry into the History of Scotland,' including with it his 'Dissertation on the Scythians or Goths.' Sir Walter Scott mentions, in March 1813, that Pinkerton had a play coming out at Edinburgh, and that it was 'by no means bad poetry, but not clikely to be popular' (Lockhart, Life of Scott, ed. 1847, p. 236). During the latter period of his life Pinkerton resided in Paras, where he died on 10 March 1826. He is described as 'a very little and very thin old man, with a very small, sharp, yellow face, thickly pitted by the small-pox, and decked with a pair of green spectacles' (Nicuols, Illustr. v. 073). His literary talents were scarcely commensurate with his powers of research; and his judgment was not unfrequently warped by peculiar prejudices and eccentricities. Certain infirmities of temper and character created also many breaches in his friendships; and in several instances he showed himself a somewhat spiteful enemy. He married in 1793 Miss Burgess of Odiham, Hampshire, sister of Thomas Burgess (1756-1897) [q. v.], bishop of Salisbury; but they separated, and left no family.

Portraits of Pinkerton are prefixed to his 'History of Scotland' and his 'Literary Correspondence,' 1830.

[Nichols's Illustrations, v. 665-73 and passim; Gunt. Mag. 1826, pp. 469-72; Pinkerton's Literary Correspondence; Chambers's Eminent Scotsmen; Life of Archibald Constable, Lockhart's Life of Scott.] T. F. H.

PINKETHMAN, WILLIAM (d. 1725), actor, held originally a low rank in the theatre. A tendency to overact and to introduce vulgar and impertinent business established him in the favour of the 'groundlings,' and he rose in time to be a trusted, and in some senses a competent, performer. He is first heard of at the Theatre Royal, subsequently Drury Lane, in 1692, in Shadwell's Volunteers, or the Stock-jobbers,' in which he played Taylor, an original part of six lines. In the same or the following year he was the original Porter in Southerne's 'Maid's Last Prayer,' and in 1694, in Ravenscroft's 'Canterbury Guests. or a Bargain Broken,' he played Second Innkeeper and Jack Sawce. On the secesion, in 1695, of Betterton and his associates, Pinkethman was promoted to a better line of parts. In 1696, accordingly, he played Jaques in the 'Third Part of Don Quixote,' by I)'Urfey; Dr. Pulse in Mrs. Manley's' Lost Lover; 'Palamon in 'Pausanias,' by Norton or Southerne; Sir Merlin Marteen in Mrs. Behn's 'Younger Brother, or the Amorous Jill; 'Nie Froth, an innkeeper, in 'The Cornish Comedy; and Castillio, jun., in Neglected Virtue, or the Unhappy Conqueror. Among his original parts, in 1697, were Tom Dawkins in Settle's 'Man in the Moon,' Amorous in 'Female Wits' (in which also he appeared in his own character), Clusman in 'Triumphs of Virtue,' Major Rakishin Cibber's 'Woman's Wit, Baldernoe in Dennis's 'Plot and No Plot, First Tradesman, Quaint, and Sir Poli-Plot, First Tradesman, squame, Assop, and dorus Hogstye in Vanbrugh's 'Æsop,' and Lawver.' He also played the Lieutenant in the 'Humourous Lieutenant' of Beaumont and Fletcher. Min Heer (sic) Tomas, a fat burgomaster, in D'Ursey's 'Campaigners, or Pleasant Adventures at Brussels,' Snatchpenny in Lacy's 'Sauny the Scot, or the Taming of the Shrew,' and Pedro in Powell's 'Imposture Defeated,' belong to 1698; and Club in Farquhar's 'Love and a Bottle,' Jonathan in 'Love without Interest,' Beau Clincher in Farquhar's 'Constant Couple, or a Trip to the Jubilee,' to 1699, in which year he recited the prologue to the first part of D'Urfey's 'Rise and Fall of Massaniello,' and probably played in both parts of the play. He was: in 1700 the Mad Taylor in a revival of the 'Pilgrim,' and played the first Dick Addle in 'Courtship à la Mode,' a play written by Crawford, and given, as were other comedies, to Pinkethman. Don Lewis in 'Love makes a Man, or the Fop's Fortune '(Cibber's adaptation from Beaumont and Fletcher), Pun in Baker's 'Humours of the Age,' Clincher, the Jubilee Beau turned into a politician, in 'Sir Harry Wildair' (Farquhar's sequel to the 'Constant Couple'), Charles Codshead in D'Urfey's 'Bath,' belong to 1701. In 1702 he was the original Old Mirabel in Farquhar's 'Inconstant,' Will Faulove in Burnaby's 'Modish Husband,' Lopez in Vanbrugh's 'False Friend,' Trim in Steele's 'Funeral,' Trappanti in Cibber's 'She would and she would not,' and Subtleman in Farquhar's 'Twin Rivals.' He also recited what was known as 'Pinkethman's Epilogue.' It was at this time, when playing many characters of high importance, that Gildon, in his 'Comparison between Two Stages, spoke of him as the flower of Bartholomew Fair and the idol of the rabble; a fellow that overdoes everything, and spoils many a part with his own stuff.' In 1708 he created Squib in Baker's 'Tunbridge Walks,' Maggol head (mayor of Coventry) in D'Urfey's 'Old Mode and the New,' and Whimsey in Estcourt's 'Fair Example.' At the booth in Bartholomow Fair, which he held with Bullock and Simpson, he played on 24 Aug. 1703 Toby in 'Jephtha's Rash Yow.' In this year also the company was at Bath. Storm in the 'Lying Lover' followed at Drury Lane on 2 Dec. 1703, and Festolin in 'Love the Leveller' on 26 Jan. 1704. He also appeared in Young Harfort in the 'Lancashire Witches,' giving his epilogue on an ass. Humphry Gubbin in Steele's 'Tender Husband' was first seen on 23 April 1705; and Chum, a poor scholar, in Baker's 'Hampstead Heath' on 30 Oct. 1705.

After the union of the Haymarket and Drury Lane companies in 1708, fewer original characters came to Pinkethman, who, however, was assigned important parts in standard plays. He was, on 14 Dec. 1708, the First Knapsack in Baker's 'Fine Lady's Airs, and on 11 Jan. 1709 Sir Oliver Outwit in 'Rival Fools,' an alteration of 'Wit at several Weapons, by Beaumont and Fletcher. On 4 April 1707, for his benefit, he spoke with Jubilee Dicky [see NORRIS, HENRY] a new epilogue. The two actors represented the figures of Somebody and Nobody. At the Haymarket he created, on 12 Dec. 1709, Clinch in Mrs. Centlivre's 'Man's Bewitched,' and on 1 May 1710 Faschinetti in C. Johnson's 'Love in a Chest.' On 15 June he opened a theatre in Greenwich, where he played comedy and tragedy, appearing as First Witch in 'Macbeth.' On 7 April 1711 he was, at Drury Lane, the original Tipple in 'Injured Love;' on 7 Nov. 1712 the first Sir Gaudy Tulip, an old beau. in the 'Successful Pyrate;' on 29 Jan. 1713 Bisket in Charles Shadwell's 'Humours of the Army;' and, 12 May, Franklyn in Gay's 'Wife of Bath.' On 23 Feb. 1715 he was the first Jonas Dock in Gay's 'What d've call it?' In Addison's 'Drummer, or the Haunted House,' he was, on 10 May 1716, the first Butler, and on 16 Jan. 1717 Underplot in the ill-starred 'Three Hours after Marriage.' On 9 Sept. 1717 he acted Old Merriman in a droll called 'Twice Married and a Maid still,' given at Pinkethman and Pack's booth, Southwark Fair. On 19 Feb. 1718 he was, at Drury Lane, the first Ringwood in Breval's 'The Play is the Plot.' On 14 Feb. 1721 he was the original Sir Gilbert Wrangle in Cibber's 'Refusal.' This appears to have been practically his last original part. On 9 Jan. 1723 he was Pyramus in the burlesque scene from 'Midsummer Night's Dream' fitted into 'Love in a Forest,' an alteration of 'As you like it.' On 23 May 1724 he appeared in 'Epsom Wells,' for his benefit. At an uncertain datche played Judge Tutchin in Lodowick Barry's Ram Alley, or Merry Tricks. He retired from the stage in 1724 and died on 20 Sept. 1725, leaving a considerable estate (Hist. Reg. 1725, p. 42).

Among characters, not original, which were assigned him in the latter half of his career were Dr. Caius, Sir William Belfond in Shadwell's 'Squire of Alsatia,' Day in the 'Committee,' Nonsense in Brome's 'Northern Lass,' Hearty in Brome's 'Jovial Crew,' Crack in 'Sir Courtly Nice,' Antonio in the 'Chances,' Daniel in 'Oroonoko,' Old Brag in 'Love for Money,' Antonio in 'Venice Preserved,' Gentleman Ushor in 'Lear,' Abel Drugger, Costar Pearmain, Snap in 'Love's Last Shift,' Scrub, Old Bellair in Man of the Mode,' Calianax in the 'Maid's Tragedy,' Ruflian and Apothecary in 'Caius Marius,' Thomas Appletree in the 'Recruiting Officer,' and Jerry Blackacre in the 'Plain Douler.'

Pinkethman, also known as Penkethman, Pinkeman, occasionally even Pinkerman, &c., and, by a familiar abridgment, Pinkey, was a droll rather than a comedian, and an imitator of Anthony Leigh [q. v.], of whom, according to Colley Cibber, he came far short. In the prologue to the 'Conscious Lovers' it is said-

Some fix all wit and humour in grimace, And make a hvelihood of Pinkey's face.

As Lacy in the 'Relapse' he succeeded Doggett, and, though much inferior, eclipsed him in the part. He made a success as Geta in the 'Prophetess,' and Orack in 'Sir Courtly Nice,' parts which lent themselves to one who always 'delighted more in the whimsical than the natural.' ('ibber, who calls him 'honest Pinkey,' and owns to an attachment to him, denies him judgment. The matter he inserted in the characters assigned him was not always palatable even to his patrons in the gallery, When he encountered what Oibber called a disgracia, he was in the habit of saying 'Odso! I believe I am a little wrong here,' a confession which once turned the reproof of the audience into applause. Playing Harlequin in Mrs. Behn's Emperor of the Moon,' he was induced by his admirers to doff his mask. The result was disaster, his humour was disconcerted, and his performance failed to please. The nature of his gags may be judged from the following story. Playing Thomas Appletree, a recruit, in the 'Recruiting Officer,' he was asked his name by Wilks, as Captain Plume; he replied, 'Why, don't you know my name, Bob? I thought every fool had known that.' 'Thomas Appletree,' whis-pered Wilks, in a rage. 'Thomas Apple-tree! Thomas Devil!' said he; 'my name is Will Pinkothman,' and, addressing the rallery, asked if that were not the case. The mob at first enjoyed Wilks's discomfiture, but ultimately showed by hisses their disapproval of the 'clown.' Pinkethman is praised in the 'Tatler' and the 'Spectator.' Steele, in answer to an imaginary challenge from Bullock and Pinkethman to establish a parallel between them such as he had house, he left Bristol during the night. Coninstituted between Wilks and Cibber, said: fliets between the mob on one side and special They both distinguish themselves in a very constables and soldiers on the other conparticular manner under the discipline of the tinued through the evening, and thrice the crabtree, with the only difference that Mr. Bullock has the more agreeable squall, and Mr. Pinkethman the more graceful shrug; Pinkethman devours a cold chick with great applause, Bullock's talent lies chiefly in sparrow grass; Pinkothman is vory dexterous at conveying himself under a table, Bullock is no less active at jumping over a stick; Mr. Pinkethman has a great deal of money, but Mr. Bullock is the taller man' (Tatler, vol. iv. No. 188; cf. vol. i. No. 4).

A portrait of Pinkethman, engraved by R. B. Parkes, from a painting by Schmutz, an imitator of Sir Godfrey Kneller, is in Mr. Lowe's edition of Cibber's 'Apology.' shows him with a long and rather handsome face and full periwig.

Pinkethman, described as a bachelor of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, married, on 22 Nov. 1714, at Bow Church, Middlesex, Elizabeth Hill, maiden, of St. Paul's, Shadwell (Notes and Queries, 3rd ser. vi. 40). Pinkethman's booth descended to his son, who, at the opening of Covent Garden Theatre, 7 Dec. 1732, played Waitwell in the 'Way of the World, was Antonio in 'Chances' at Drury Lane, 23 Nov. 1739, and died 15 May 1740 (Gent. Mag. 1740, p. 262).

| Books cited; Noble's Biog Hist. is, 351-2; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. ix. 86; Guardian, 15 June 1713; Genesi's English Stage; Downes's Roseius Anglicanus; Colley Cibber's Apology, ed. Lowe; Morley's Bertholomew Fair; Gildon's Comparison between Two Stages, Davies's Dramatic Miscellanies.]

PINKNEY, MILES (1599-1674), catholic divine. [See CARRE, THOMAS.]

CHARLES PINNEY, (1793-1867),mayor of Bristol, born on 29 April 1793, was son of John Preter (1740-1818), who assumed, on succeeding to the Pinney estates in 1762, the surname and arms of Pinney by royal license. Charles was a merchant and slaveowner, in partnership with E. Case at Bristol, a firm which in 1833 received 3,5721 as compensation for the emancipation of their slaves. On 16 Sept. 1831 Pinney was sworn in mayor of Bristol, and hold that office during the riots caused by the rejection of the Reform Bill. These riots commenced on Saturday, 29 Oct. 1831, on the entrance into the city of Sir Charles Wetherell, the recorder, who was very unpopular, owing to the part he had taken in opposing the Reform Bill in the House of Commons, and was immediately mobbod. After taking refuge in the mansion mayor read the Riot Act. The next day, Sunday, the rioters reassembled, and the mayor's life was in danger. The mob burnt and destroyed the mansion house, the bishop's palace, the custom-house, the excise office, the gaol, and two sides of Queen's Square. Finally the military, until then in a state of indecision, charged and fired on the people. About sixteen persons were killed, or perished in the flames, and one hundred were wounded or injured. Those rioters who were captured were tried by a spicial commission in Bristol in January 1832, when four of them were executed and twenty-two transported [see for the conduct of the troops, Brirdian, 1782-1832].

On 25 Oct. 1832 Pinney was put on his trial in the court of king's bench, charged with neglect of duty in his office as mayor of Bristol during the riots. After a trial lasting seven days the jury returned a verdict of not guilty, asserting that Pinney 'acted according to the best of his judgment, with zeal and personal courage.' In 1836 he was chosen one of the first aldermen in the reformed corporation. He died at Camp House, Clifton, on 17 July 1867.

He married, on 7 March 1830, Frances Mary, fourth daughter of John Still of Knoyle, Wiltshire, and had issue Frederick Wake Preter Pinney of the Grange, Somerton; John Charles Pinney, vicar of Coleshill, Warwickshire; and a daughter.

[Nicholls and Taylor's Bristol, 1882, iii. 325—388, Bristol Laberal, 17 Sept. 1831, p. 3; Latimer's Annals of Bristol, 1887, pp. 146–79, 188, 212; Trial of Charles Pinney, Eq. 1833; Ann. Register, 1831 pp. 292, &c., 1832 pp. 5, &c.; Times, 30 Oct. 1831 et seq., 26 Oct. 1832 et seq.; Burke's Landed Gentry, 1886, ii. 1467–8; Gent. Mag. September 1867, p. 398.] G. O. B.

PINNOCK, WILLIAM (1782-1848), publisher and educational writer, baptised at Alton, Hampshire, on 3 Feb. 1782, was son of John and Sarah Pinnock, who were in humble circumstances. He began life as a schoolmaster at Alton. He next became a bookseller there, and wrote and issued in 1810-11 'The Leisure Hour: a pleasing Pastime consisting of interesting and improving Subjects, with explanatory notes, and 'The Universal Explanatory Spelling Book,' with a key and exercises. About 1811 he removed his business to Newbury. In 1817 he came to London, and, together with Samuel Maunder [q. v.], bought the business premises of the Literary Gazette, at 267 Strand, the partners also taking shares with Jerdan and Colburn in that periodical. Pinnock and Maunder ceased to print the paper after the hundred and forty-sixth number, and then entered upon the publication of a series of educational works. While at Alton, Pinnock had planned a system of 'Catechisms,'which Maunder now put into execution. Pinnock was advertised as the author, but did little of the literary work himself. The 'Catechisms' formed short himself. manuals of popular instruction, by means of question and answer, on almost every conceivable subject. Eighty-three were issued at 9d. each, and some with a few illustrations. They met with extraordinary success, and were collected in 'The Juvenile Cyclopiedia.' 'The Catechism of Music' was translated into German by C. F. Michaelis in 1825, and 'The Catechism of Geography' into French by J. G. Delavoye. The thirteenth edition of 'The Catechism of Modern History' was edited by W. Cooke Taylor (1829). Even greater success attended Pinnock's abridgments of Goldsmith's histories of England. Greece, and Rome, the first of which brought 2,000% within a year. More than a hundred editions of these were sold before 1858. His series of county histories, which appeared collectively as 'History and Topography of England and Wales' in 1825, was also very successful, and he prepared new editions of 'Mangnall's Questions' and 'Joyce's Scientific Dialogues.' Jerdan was of opinion that he might have made from 4,000*l*, to 5,000*l*, a year by his publications. Unfortunately, however, he had a mania for speculation, and was obliged to part with most of his copyrights to Messrs. Whittaker and other publishers. He lost a large sum in an attempt to secure a monopoly of veneering wood, and sank further capital in manufacturing pianos out of it when he found it unsaleable. The result was that he was always in financial distress. He died in Broadley Terrace, Blandford Square, London, on 21 Oct. 1813.

Jerdan describes Pinnock as a 'well-meaning and honest man ruined by an excitable temperament.' The progress of popular education owed something to his cheap publications. Besides his eighty-three catechisms, grammars, and abridged histories, Pinnock issued: 1. 'The Universal Explanatory English Reader . . . consisting of Selections in Prose and Poetry on interesting Subjects,' 1813, 12mo, Winchester; 5th edit. enlarged, 1821, London. 2. 'The Young Gentleman's Library of useful and entertaining Knowledge . . . with engravings by M. U. Sears,' 1829, 8vo. 3. 'The Young Lady's Library,' &c. 1829. 4. 'A Guide to Knowledge,' 1833. 5. 'A pictorial Miscellany for Intellectual Improvement,' 1843.

A portrait of W. Pinnock, with autograph, waspainted by Beard and engraved by Mote. Another was engraved by Findon. Pinnock married a sister of his partner, Samuel Maunder.

His son, WILLIAM HUNRY PINNOCK (1813-1885), divine and author, was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, graduated LL.B. in 1850 and LL.D. in 1855, being placed in the first class of the law tripos, and in 1859 he was admitted ad eundem at Oxford. He was ordained in 1843, and acted as curate and locum tenens of Somersham and Colne in Huntingdonshire for two successive regius professors of divinity at Cambridge. He was English chaplain at Chantilly from 1870 to 1876, when he became curate in charge of All Saints', Dalston. In 1879 he was presented to the vicarage of Pinner, Hertfordshire, where he died on 30 Nov. 1885.

In his earlier years Pinnock, like his father, compiled elementary textbooks. He revised and improved the twenty-first edition of the 'Catechism of Astronomy,' and rdited a new edition (1817) of the 'History of England made casy.' He also wrote a continuation of Finnock's abridgment of (foldsmith's 'History of England,' 46th edit. 1858. Many gross errors in this were pointed out in the 'Contleman's Magazine' (1859, pp. 261, 591-6). He was author of several works upon ecclesiastical laws and usages, and some scriptural manuals by him, which were clearly written, were largely used in schools. His chief works were: 1. 'The Laws and Usages of the Church and Clergy—the Un-beneficed Clerk, 2nd edit. 1854. 2. 'Rubrics for Communicants, explanatory of the Holy Communion Office . . with Prayers, 1863, 12mo. 3. The Law of the Rubric; and the Transition Period of the Church of England, 1866. 4. 'The Church Key, Belfry Key, and Organ Key, with legal cases and opinions, parish lay councils, and the autocracy of the clergy, 1870. 5. A posthumous work in two volumes, 'The Bible and Contomporary History: an Epitome of the History of the World from the Creation to the end of the Old Testament, was edited by E. M. B. in 1887. Pinnock also edited 'Clerical Papers on Church and Parishioners,' 6 yols, 1852-63 (Times, 5 Dec. 1885).

[Jerdan's Men I have known, pp. 336-47; Literary Cazotte, 18 Nov. 1813, and Autobiography, passin; Alton parish register; Alli-bone's Dict. of Engl. Lit. ii. 1600; Brit. Mus. Cat.; Ann. Rog. 1843, App. to Chron. p. 306, Evans's Cat. lingr. Portraits, No. 208, 349.] G. Ln G. N.

BRENT, CHARLOFFE.

PINTO, THOMAS (1710?-1773), violinist, was born in England about 1710, of Neapolitan parents. His genius for violinplaying developed early, and at the age of eleven it was said that he could play the whole of Corelli's concertos. Before he was twenty he led a number of important concerts, including those in the St. Cecilia Hall at Edinburgh. His astonishing powers of reading even the most difficult music at sight led to carelessness and neglect of practice, and he 'affected the fine gentleman rather than the musical student . . . a switch in his hand displaced the forgotten fiddle-stick' (Dvnound, The Violin, 1832). The success of Giardini, who came to England in 1750. roused in him an ambition not to be outdone. Making greater efforts than hitherto, he became leader of the Italian opera on those occasions on which Giardini was engaged elsewhere. He was also at various times first violinist at Drury Lane Theatre, and leader at provincial festivals, including those of Hereford and Worcester (1758), Gloucestor (1760), and at Vauxhall (fardens. In 1769, when Arnold purchased Marylebone Gardens, Pinto took some share in the speculation, and was leader of the orchestra. The vonture proved a failure, and Pinto took refuge, first in Edinburgh, and subsequently in Ireland, where he led the band at Crow Street Theatre, Dublin. There he died in 1773 (O'Killern, Recollections, 1826, pp. 346-7). A portrait of Pinto, engraved ad vivum by Reinagle, is mentioned by Bromley.

Pinto was twice married: first, to Sybilla (4ronamann, daughter of a German clergyman; and, secondly, to Charlotte Brent [q. v.], the singer and favourite pupil of Dr. Arne, who died in poverty in 1802. With her, Pinto made several prolonged tours. A daughter of Pinto, by his first wife, married one Sauters, by whom she had a Georgia Frideric Pinto (1787-1806), who assumed the surname of his grandfather, was born at Lamboth 23 Sept. 1787, and after studying under Salomon and Viotti, took part as a violinist at the age of twelve in the concerts at Covent Garden; at fifteen he appeared in public performances of Haydn's symphonics at Salomon's concerts. After 1800 Pinto travelled with Salomon, playing at Oxford, Cambridge, Bath, Edinburgh, where his success was remarkable, and twice visited Paris. Besides playing the violin, Pinto was an excellent planist, and from the age of sixteen years he wrote sonatas for pianoforte solo and with violin, and a PINTO, Mrs. (d. 1802), singer. [See large number of songs. Several of the songs enjoyed considerable vogue in their day.

Pinto died on 23 March 1806, at Little Chelsea. He was buried at St. Margaret's, Westminster, near Mrs. Pinto, his grandfather's second wife.

Salomon declared that Pinto could have become an 'English Mozart' had he possessed sufficient force of character to resist the allurements of society. He was well read, and a good conversationalist. He was wont to visit prisons, 'sympathising with the inmates, distributing the contents of his purse among them, and contributing more than he could afford to support an unfortunate friend with a large family.'

[Grove's Dict. of Music and Musicians; Georg. Era, iv. 544; Musical World, 1840; Lysons's Origin and Progress of the Meeting of the Three Choirs, &c., continued by C. Lee Williams and H. G. Chance; Dubourg's The Violin, 1832, and subsequent editions; references, chiefly of an anecdotal character, in Kelly's Reminiscences, Parke's Memoirs, &c., O'Keeffo's Recollections, 1826, and other memoirs of the period.]

PINWELL, GEORGE JOHN (1842-1875), water-colour painter, was born in London on 26 Dec. 1842. His early life appears to have been a struggle against difficulties, and his first instruction in drawing to have been obtained in some local school of art until 1862, when he entered Heatherley's drawing academy in Newman Street. In 1863 he began his professional career by designing and drawing on wood, chiefly for the brothers Dalziel, whom he assisted in the production of their edition of the 'Arabian Nights' Entertainments,' and for whom he made the designs for Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield,' published in 1864. He was employed also on illustrations for the 'Sunday Magazine,' 'Good Words,' 'Once a Week.' 'London Society,' and other periodicals; and, together with Frederick Walker, John W. North, and others, he illustrated 'A Round of Days' (1866), Robert Buchanan's 'Ballad Stories of the Affections' (1866) and 'Wayside Posies' (1867), Jean Ingelow's 'Poems' (1867), and other works, in all of which he was very successful. On the opening of the Dudley Callery in 1805, he exhibited his first water-colour painting, 'An Incident in the Life of Oliver Goldsmith,' which was followed, in 1866-9, by five other drawings. In 1869 he was elected an associate of the Society of Painters in Water-colours, of which he became a full member in 1870. He contributed regularly to the society's exhibitions, his more important works being two subjects from Browning's poem of 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin' and 'A Seat in St. James's Park,' in 1869;

'The Elixir of Love,' 'At the Foot of the Quantocks,' and 'Landlord and Tenant' in 1870; 'Away from Town' (a study of girl, and turkeys), 'Time and his Wife' and 'The Earl o' Quarterdeck' in 1871; 'Gilbert à Becket's Troth—the Saracen Maiden entering London at Sundown,' in 1872; 'The Great Lady' in 1873; 'The Beggar's Roost,' 'The Prison Hole,' and 'The Auctioneer' (three scenes in Tangier) in 1874; and 'The Old Clock' and 'We fell out. my Wife and I,' in 1875. He was also elected an honorary member of the Belgian Society of Painters in Water-colours.

Pinwell seems to have formed his style on that of Frederick Walker. His compositions were original, and were painted with much delicacy; while, his designs possessed great power. But there was not always the same quality in his colouring, and his work suffered from a peculiar mode of dealing with the effects of light and shade. He studied painting in oil, but left only some unfinished works, with one of which-'Vanity Fair' -he hoped to have made his mark. Illhealth caused great inequalities in his later work, and a visit to Tangier failed to prolong a life of much hope and promise. He died of consumption at his residence, Warwick House, Adelaide Road, Haverstock Hill, London, on 8 Sept. 1875, and was buried in Highgate cemetery. An exhibition of his works was held in Deschamps's Gallery in New Bond Street in February 1876, and his remaining drawings and sketches were sold by auction by Messrs. Ohristie, Manson, & Woods, on 16 March 1876. His 'Strolling Players' was engraved in line by Charles Cousen for the 'Art Journal' of 1873, and 'The Elixir of Love' was etched by Robert W. Macbeth, A.R.A., in 1885. There are etchings also by W. H. Boucher of Pinwell's 'Princess and the Ploughboy' and 'Strollers.'

[Roget's History of the Old Water-colour Society, 1891, ii. 396-9; Exhibition Catalogues of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours, 1869-75, Art Journal, 1875, p. 365; Athensum, 1875, ii. 349, 380; Pall Mall Gazette, 9 Sept. 1875; Illustrated London News (with portrait), 18 Sept. 1875; Birmingham Weekly Post, 30 March 1895.]

PIOZZI, HESTER LYNCH (1741–1821), friend of Dr. Johnson, was born on 16 Jan. 1740-1 at Bodvel, near Pwilheli, Carnarvonshire (HAYWARD, i. 40, ii. 321, 859). Her father, John Salusbury, was a descendant of Richard Clough [q.v.], from whom he inherited the estate of Bachycraig, Flintshire. He married his cousin, Hester Maria, sister of Sir Robert Salusbury ('otton, and had at this time run through his property and been compelled to retire to a small cottage in a remote district. He was patronised by Lord Halifax, who, on becoming president of the board of trade (October 1748), sent him out in some capacity to Nova Scotia. His wife, with Hester, their only child, had some time before gone to live at Lleweny Hall, Denbighshire, with her brother, Sir R. S. Cotton, a childless widower, who promised to provide for his niece, but died before making his will. After Salusbury's emigration they lived first with Mrs. Salusbury's mother, Lady Cotton, at East Hyde, near Luton, Bedfordshire; and afterwards with Sir Thomas (brother of John Salusbury, judge of the admiralty court), who had married the heiress of Sir Henry Penrice, and lived at Offley Hall, Hertfordshire. Hester was a clever and lively girl. She became a daring horsewoman, and learnt Latin-apparently not Greek (HAYWARD, i. 49, 114), though a knowledge both of Greek and Hebrew is attributed to her by Mangin-and modern languages from Dr. Collier, a civilian, to whom she became much attached. She wrote papers before she was fifteen in the 'St. James's Chronicle.' Her father, after fighting duels and 'behaving perversely' in Nova Scotia, had returned to England, and went to Ireland with Lord Halifax. who was made lord lieutenant in 1761. During his absence, Sir Thomas proposed a marriage between his niece and Henry Thrule. Thrale was the son of a native of Offley who had become a rich brewer, and had brought up his son and daughters 'quite in a high style.' Neither of the young people cared for the other, but the uncle's promises to make a settlement upon his niece on condition of the marriage decided Thrale and Mrs. Salusbury. Hester appealed to her father upon his return. quarrelled with his brother, and took his wife and child to London. There he died suddenly in December 1762. His daughter seems to imply that his death was hastened by irritation at her proposed marriage to Thrale, and at Sir Thomas's own intention to marry a second wife. Her father being out of the way, Miss Salusbury was married to Thrale on 11 Oct. 1763. She declares that Thrale only took her because other ladies to whom he had proposed refused to live in the borough (ib. ii. 24). Thrale had also a house at Streatham Park (destroyed in 1863), and kept a pack of hounds and a hunting box near Croydon. Mrs. Thrale complains that she was not allowed to ride or to manage the household, and was thus driven to amuse herself with literature and her children. Thrale was a solid, respectable man, who apparently behaved kindly to his wife (see her 'character' of him, ib. ii. 188); but he gave her some real cause for jealousy. The famous intimacy with Johnson began at the end of 1704, and in 1765 (see Birkbeck Hill in Boswell's Johnson, i. 490, 520-2) Johnson was almost domesticated at Streatham. He accompanied the Thrales to Wales in 1774, and to France in 1775. Thrale was elected for Southwark in December 1765. and continued to represent the borough till the election of 1780, when he was defeated. Mrs. Thrale took part in writing addresses and canvassing the electors. In 1772 Thrale was brought into great difficulties by eapenses incurred to carry out a scheme, suggested by a quack, for making beer 'without malt or hops' (HAYWIRD, ii. 26). Mrs. Thrale raised money from her mother and other friends; and says that, although their debts then amounted to 130,000%, they were all paid off in nine years. She afterwards took an active part in the business, besides managing her estate in Wales (ib. i. 70). On 21 Feb. 1780 Thrale had an attack of apoplexy, which permanently weakened his Mrs. Thrale had also been much vexed for some time by his flirtations with 'Sophy Streatfield,' a pretty widow (ib. i. 110), who is also described by Miss Burney and who appears to have made many other conquests. Thrale's incapacity, his extravagance, and over-indulgence in eating caused his wife much anxiety, and on 4 April 1781 he died of a second attack. The brewery was soon afterwards sold to the Barclays for 135,0001. Thrale, she says, had left 20,0001. to each of his five daughters, and she estimated her own income at 3,000% a year. which, however, turned out to be considerably above the mark (ib. i. 168). She had had twelve children, of whom Henry, the only son, died on 28 March 1776. Her cldest daughter, Hester Maria [see EL-PHINSTONE, HESTER MARIA], afterwards became Viscountess Keith. Another became Mrs. Hoare. The youngest surviving daughter, Cecilia, was afterwards Mrs. Mostyn. Another daughter appears to have remained unmarried, and a fifth died in infancy in 1783.

Mrs. Thrale had made the acquaintance of Gabriel Piozzi, an Italian musician of much talent, in 1780. He was her senior by six months (HAYWARD, i. 174). She had taken a fancy to him, which now ripened into passion. By the end of 1781 they were very intimate, and in August 1782, finding herself involved in a lawsuit with Lady Salusbury and straitened for money, she resolved to go to see Italy with Piozzi as guide, and to economise (ib. i. 166). She began to complain of Johnson. His approval of her plan of travel showed, she thought, want of desire for her company, and she no doubt foresaw that he would object to the marriage with Piozzi, which she was beginning to contemplate. Her cldest daughter also strongly disapproved. She left Streatham in October 1782 and went to Brighton, whither Johnson followed her. She returned to London, and, after a violent scene with her eldest daughter, resolved to give up Piozzi. She told him in January that they must part (ib. i. 220). She retired to Bath, and Piozzi left for Italy (8 May 1783) at the same time. In the 'Anecdotes' she attributes her retreat to Bath exclusively to the desire to escape from Johnson's tyranny; but her diary (ib. i. 169, 196) shows that this was at most a very subordinate motive [see under Johnson, Samuel, 1709-1784]. Her daughters, seeing that her health was affected, finally consented to the recall of Piozzi. She was married by a catholic priest in London on 23 July, and at St. James's, Bath, according to the Anglican ritual, on 25 July 1784. A match with an Italian Roman catholic musician was naturally regarded with excessive disapproval by the society of that time. It involved a separation from her eldest daughter, of whom she speaks with coldness and resentment (HAYWARD, i. 305, ii. 69). They appear to have been afterwards on civil but distant terms. Cecilia, the youngest, stayed with her.

Upon her marriage she went to Italy with her husband; spent the winter at Milan, and in the next summer was at Florence, where she made friends with Robert Merry [q.v.] and the 'Della Cruscans.' She contributed to the 'Florence Miscellany,' ridiculed in Gifford's 'Baviad' and 'Meeviad,' and wrote the preface. She also wrote there her 'Anecdotes,' giving a very lively picture of Johnson, though it is partly coloured by a desire to defend her own conduct. It sold well, though it excited a good deal of ridicule, as indicated by Peter Pindar's 'Bozzy and Piozzi.' She returned to England in March 1787, and was bitterly attacked by Baretti [q.v.], who had lived for three years in her house as tutor to Miss Thrale, in the 'European Magazine.' He is also supposed by Mr. Hayward to have been the author of 'The Sentimental Moth, a Comedy in Five Acts: the Legacy of an old Friend . . . to Mrs. Hester Lynch Thrale, &c. (1789). She appears, however, to have been well received in society, and settled at Streatham Park, upon which she and her husband spent 2,000%. She published Johnson's letters, for which, Boswell says, she had 500%, in 1783, and some other books (see below), showing an overestimate of her own accomplishments. At the end of 1795 she left Streatham for Wales. She lived there with her husband, who repaired Bachycraig, but afterwards built a villa, called Brynhella, in the valley of the Clwyd. He died there of gout in March 1809. She adopted a nephew of his. John Piozzi, to whom she gave the Welsh property on his marriage to a Miss Pemberton. Piozzi had saved 6,000l., and left everything to his wife (HAYWARD, ii. 75). They spent most of their winters at Bath. and after his death she seems to have generally lived there. When nearly eighty she took a great fancy to a handsome young actor, William Augustus Conway [q.v.], and it was reported that she proposed to marry him. Her 'love-letters' to him, written in 1819 and published in 1848, are of doubtful authenticity, but in any case only show that she became silly in her old age. On 27 Jan. 1820 she celebrated her eightieth (or seventyninth?) birthday by a ball to six or seven hundred people at Bath, and led off the dances with her adopted son. She died on 2 May 1821, leaving everything to this son, who, having taken her maiden name and been knighted when sheriff of Flintshire, was now Sir John Piozzi Salusbury.

Mrs. Piozzi was a very clever woman; well read in English literature, though her knowledge of other subjects was apparently superficial. Her early experience had given her rather cynical views of life, and she seems to have been rather hard and masculine in character; but she also showed a masculine courage and energy in various embarrassments. Her love of Piozzi, which was both warm and permanent, is the most amiable feature of her character. She cast off her daughters as decidedly as she did Dr. Johnson; but it is impossible not to admire her vivacity and independence. She was short and plump, and if not regularly pretty, had an interesting face. An engraving from a miniature by Roche, taken when she was seventy-seven, is prefixed to Hayward's first volume, and an engraving of Hogarth's, 'Lady's Last Stake,' to the second. She 'sate for this,' as she says, when under fourteen (ib. ii, 309). If so, Hogarth must have idealised the picture considerably; but it appears to have been painted in 1759 [see under Hogarth, William].

Mrs. Piozzi's works are: 1. 'Anecdotes of the late Samuel Johnson, during the last twenty years of his Life,' 1786. 2. 'Letters to and from the late Samuel Johnson, LL.D.,' 1788. 3. 'Observations and Reflections made in the course of a Journey through Ciaran than Ciaran of Saigir (HADDAN and France, Italy, and Germany, 2 vols. 8vo, 1789. 4. British Synonymy, 1794 (a book with some amusing anecdotes, but otherwise worthless). 5. 'Retrospection: or a Review of the most striking and important Events, Characters, Situations, and their Consequences which the last eighteen hundred years have presented to the Views of Mankind, 2 vols. 4to, 1801. She wrote many light verses, most of which are given in the second volume of Hayward. The best known, the 'Three Warnings,' first appeared in the 'Miscellanies' published by Johnson's friend, Mrs. Williams, in 1766.

[Autobiography, Letters, and Literary Remains of Mrs. Piozzi . . . edited . . . by A. Hayward, Q.C., 1861, 2 vols. 8vo; 2nd edit. enlarged (and cited above) in same year. This is founded partly upon 'Thraliana, a notebook kept by her from 1776 to 1809; with autobiographical fragments, marginal notes on books, and some correspondence. 'Piozziana; or Recollections of the late Mrs. Piozzi, with Remarks. By a Friend' (the Rev. E. Mungin), 1833, describes her last years at Bath. Her own publications, Boswell's Johnson, and Mme. d'Arblay's Diaries and Memoirs of Dr. Burney, also give many references.]

PIPRE or PIPER, FRANCIS LD (d. 1698), artist. [See Luripre.]

PIRAN or PIRANUS, SAINT (A. 550), is commonly identified with Saint Ciaran (A. 500-560) [q. v.] of Saigir. The names Piran and Ciaran or Kieran are identicalp in Britain being the equivalent of the Irish k. The history of the two saints is in the main features the same, though the Irish lives of St. Ciaran do not record his migration to Cornwall. But Capgrave in his 'Nova Legenda Anglies' (p. 267), following John of Tinmouth, says 'Beatus Piranus, qui a quibusdam Kerannus vocatur, in Cornubia, ubi quiescit, Tiranus appellatur.' The same narrative states that Piran went to Cornwall at the bidding of St. Patrick, and, after performing many miracles, died, and was buried near the Severn sea, fifteen miles from Petrockstow or Padstow, and twenty-five miles from Mousehole, a situation that agrees with the ancient oratory of St. Piran at Perranzabuloe. Leland (Itinerary, iii. 195) says that Piran's mother, Wingella, was buried in Cornwall. Mr. C. W. Boase favoured the identification of Piran and Ciaran, remarking that the Irish lives 'soldom notice any such migrations, though the Celtic saints were very migratory' (Diot. Christ. Biogr. iv. 404). Other authorities, however, take an opposite view, and hold that if Piran were an Irish saint, he was probably some other St.

STUBBS, i. 157, 164).

Piran holds a foremost place in Cornish hagiology; he was the patron saint of all Cornwall, or at least of miners; and his banner, a white cross on a black ground, is alleged to have been anciently the standard of Cornwall. According to Cornish legend it was Piran who discovered tin, and hence he was the patron saint of tinners. Three parishes in the county are dedicated to him. Perranzabuloe or Perran in the Sands, which is called Lampiran in Domesday, Perran-uthnos or Perran the Little near Marasion, and Perranarworthal on Falmouth Harbour; as well as chapels in other parishes such as Tintagel. The Irish form of the name may be preserved in the parish of St. Keverne in the Lizard district, and St. Kerian in Exeter. The shrine at Perranzabuloe contained his head and other relics, and was a great resort of pilgrims (LYSONS, Cornwall, p. 264); Sir John Arundel made a bequest to it in 1433. The very ancient oratory of St. Piran at Perranzabuloe may perhaps date from the sixth century. An account of the discovery of this oratory, which was laid bare by the shifting of the sands in 1835, is given in Haslam's 'From Death unto Life,' together with some illustrations. The most interesting of the remains were removed to the Royal Institution of Cornwall's museum at Truro. The ruin of the oratory is still uncovered, but has suffered much from exposure, and has, in its present state, little interest. St. Piran was commemorated on 5 March, and this day is still kept as a feast at Perranzabuloe, Perranuthnoe, and St. Keverne. There was anciently an altar in honour of St. Piran in Exoter Cathedral, where an arm of the saint was also preserved. One of the canons' stalls in the new cathedral of Truro is named after Piran.

[Capgrave's Nova Legenda Angliæ; Colgan's Acta Sanct. Hibern. i. 458; Bolland. Acta Sanct. 5 March, i. 389-99, 901; Haddan and Stubbs's Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, i. 157, 164; Dugdale's Mon. Angl. vi. 1449; Oliver's Monasticon Exoniense, p. 71, and additional supplement, pp. 10, 11; Diet. of Chr. Biogr. iv. 404; Whitaker's Cathedral of Cornwall, ii. 6, 9, 210; Collins's Lost Church Found; Hunt's Romances of the West of England, pp. 273–5, 475–6; Boulete's Acc. of the Saints 1 Borlaso's Age of the Saints.]

PIRIE, ALEXANDER (1737-1804), Scottish divine, was born in 1737. About 1760 he was appointed teacher in philosophy in the divinity school at Abernethy, and, in the course of his lectures, recommended for the study of his pupils parts of Lord Kames's 'Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion.' For this he was suspended, and excommunicated by the synod in 1763, and an appointment which he had to preach in North America was withdrawn. Upon this, a portion of the Abernethy congregation gave its allegiance to him, and he left the anti-burgher portion of the secession church, and joined the burghers. Within a few years he was again charged with heresy, and, after an appeal from the presbytery to the synod, was suspended in 1768. In the following year he left the secession church and joined the independents, his first charge being at Blair-Logie. From this he removed to Newburgh, Fifeshire, where he died on 23 Nov. 1804.

A cultured man, and one of exceptionally liberal religious views for his time, Pirie was described as 'capable of producing something more useful and permanent than any of his works are likely to be' (ORME, Bibl. Biblica,

p. 351).

His works are: 1. 'The Procedure of the Associated Synod in Mr. Pirie's Case,' Edinburgh, 1764; a defence of himself after his first trial for heresy. 2. 'A Review of the Principles and Conduct of the Seceders, with Reasons of the Author's Separation from the Burghers in Particular, Edinburgh, 1769. 3. Sermons on some Leading Doctrines in the Christian System,' Edinburgh, 1775. 4. 'Psalms or Hymns founded on some important passages of Scripture, Edinburgh, 1777; from this collection two familiar hymns have survived, 'Come, let us join in songs of praise, and With Mary's love without her fear. 5. 'Critical and Practical Observations on Scripture Texts, Perth, 1785. 6. 'Dissertation on Baptism,' Perth, 1786. 7. 'An Attempt to expose the Weakness, Fallacy, and Absurdity of Unitarian Arguments, Perth, 1792. 8. The French Revolution exhibited in the Light of Sacred Oracles,' Perth, 1795. 9. 'Dissertation on the Hebrew Roots,' published in Edinburgh after his death, 1807. 'The Miscellaneous and Posthumous Works of Alexander Pirie,' in six volumes, were published in Edinburgh in 1805, and went through two editions.

[Scots Mag. 1763 p. [525, 1804 p. 974; McKerrow's History of the Secession Church, p. 289; Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology, p. 896.] J. R. M.

PIRIE, WILLIAM ROBINSON (1804–1885), professor of divinity and principal of the university of Aberdeen, second son of George Pirie, D.D., minister of Slains, Aberdeenshire, was born at the manse of Slains on 26 July 1804. He studied at University and King's College, Aberdeen, during sessions 1817-21, but did not graduate. Originally destined for the bar, he spent some time in a lawyer's office in Aberdeen, but ultimately yielded to his father's wish, and attended theological classes during sessions 1821-5. In 1825 he was licensed to preach by the presby-tery of Ellon, and in 1830 was presented by Gordon Cumming-Skene to the parish of Dyce, which he held for thirteen years. Pirie entered with keen spirit into the non-intrusion controversy, advocating the moderate views which were opposed to the veto system. His masterly dialectic power and shrewd practical wisdom marked him out as a guide for the church of Scotland in very difficult times. In 1840 he was presented to the Greyfriars' Church by the town council of Aberdeen; but this charge he resigned in the following year, on account of a resolution of the general assembly discouraging pluralities.

Meanwhile in 1843 he was appointed professor of divinity in Marischal College and University, and in the following year received the honorary degree of D.D., both from Marischal College and from his own alma mater, King's College. On the union of the two colleges in 1860 he was assigned the professorship of divinity and church history, and on the death of Principal Campbell, in 1876, he became the resident head of the university, retaining this post until his death.

From 1864, when Pirie was chosen moderator of the general assembly, and the free church celebrated her majority, the established church appeared to take a fresh start. The main object of his ambition and the chief subject of his thoughts for many years had been the procuring of the abolition of that system of patronage which had fettered the church since 1712. In several successive years he brought forward in the assembly a motion against patronage, the principle of which was affirmed by a large majority of that court in 1869, and formed the basis of a bill which received the sanction of parliament in 1874.

Pirie died at Aberdeen on 3 Nov. 1885. He married, on 24 March 1842, Margaret, daughter of Lewis William Forbes, D.D., minister of Boharm, and sister of Archibald Forbes, the war correspondent, by whom he had three sons and four daughters. The eldest son, George, became professor of mathematics in the university of Aberdeen in 1878.

His published works are: 1. 'The Independent Jurisdiction of the Church vindicated,' 1838. 2. 'Letter on the Veto Act and the Non-intrusion of Ministers,' 1840. 3. 'Some Notice of the Rev. Andrew Gray, 1840. 4. 'Account of the Parish of Dyce, (New Stat. Acc.), 1843. 5. 'An Inquiry into the Constitution, Powers, and Processes of the Human Mind, 1858. 6. 'The Position, Principles, and Duties of the Church of Scotland, 1864. 7. 'An Inquiry into the Fundamental Processes of Religious, Moral, and Political Science, 1867. 8. High Churchism, 1872. 9. The God of Reason and Revelution' (posthumous, 1892).

[In Memoriam W. R. Pirie, 1888; Aberdoen Journal, 4 and 9 Nov. and 16 Dec. 1885; Life and Work, December 1885; personal knowledge.]

PIRRIE, WILLIAM (1807-1882), surgeon, the son of George Pirrie, a farmer, was born near Huntly, Aberdeenshire, in 1807. He was educated at Gartly parish school; at Marischal College and University, Aberdeen, where he graduated M.A. in 1825; at the university of Edinburgh, where he graduated M.D. in 1820; and in Paris, where he studied surgery under Baron Dupuytren. Returning to Aberdeen in 1830, he was appointed lecturer on anatomy and physiology in the joint medical schools of King's and Marischal colleges. On the separation of the schools in 1839 he became the first regins professor of surgery in Marischal College; and when they were again united in 1860 he continued to teach as professor of surgery in the university of Aberdeen. In 1875 the university of Edinburgh conferred on him the honorary degree of LL.D. He resigned his chair in the summer of 1882, and died on 21 Nov. in the same year.

Holding office for fifty-two years, Pirrie was well known to three generations of Aberdeen medical students, his portly figure and somewhat assertive manner, together with his fondness for recalling his Parisian experiences under Dupnytren, gaining for him the sobriquet of 'The Baron.' His iectures were essentially demonstrative, and he possessed in a high degree the faculty of inspiring enthusiasm in his audience. To him and to his colleague in the chair of anatomy, Dr. John Struthers, is due the credit of establishing the reputation of the Aberdeen medical school, which had never been so largely attended as at his death. At his solicitation his old schoolfellow and steadfast friend through life, Sir Erasmus Wilson, founded a chair of pathology in the university.

An intropid and successful operator, he was during the latter half of his public career recognised as the foremost surgeon in the north of Scotland. He published, in addition to numerous contributions to the medical press, a treatise on 'The Principles and l'ractice of Surgery,' 1852, which passed through several editions, and long held its ground as atextbook; and, with Dr. William Keith, a work 'Acupressure, an excellent Method of arresting Surgical Hemorrhage and of accelerating the Healing of Wounds,' 1867.

[Aberdeen Journal, 22, 24, 27 Nov. 1882; [Aberdeen Journal, 22, 22, 22, 22, 22]
Lancet and Brit. Med. Journal, 2 Dec.; personal
P. J. A.

PISTRUCCI, BENEDETTO (1781-1855), gem-engraver and medallist, born in Rome on 29 May 1784, was the second son of Federico Pistrucci, judge of the high criminal court of Rome, by his wife Antonia Greco. He inherited a physical peculiarity in having his hands and feet covered with a thick callous skin. He attended schools at Bologna, Rome, and Naples, but disliked Latin and made little progress. He amused himself by constructing toy cars and cannon, and when he was fourteen learnt gem-engraving from Mango, an engraver of cameos in Rome. He learned to cut hard and soft flints, and made rapid progress, though his master was an indifferent artist. Domenico Desalief, a cameo merchant, gave Pistrucci a stone of three strata to cut for him, and employed him on a large cameo (the crowning of a warrior) that passed, as an antique, into the cabinet of the empress of Russia. When about fifteen Pistrucci was taught at Rome by Morelli, for whom he made nine He attended the drawing academy cameos. at the Campidoglio, and obtained the first prize in sculpture. He soon, however, quarrelled with Morelli, and when not quite sixteen began, as he expresses it, his 'career of professor, loaded with commissions on all sides.'

Pistrucci married at eighteen, and worked in Rome for several years for Vescovali, for the Russian Count Demidoff, for General Bale, and for Angiolo Bonelli, an unscrupulous dealer in gems who tried to pass off Pistrucci's works as antiques. Pistrucci made portraits of the queen of Naples and the Princess Borghese at their command, and executed-in competition with Girometti and Santarelli-a cameo-portrait of the Princess Bacciochi (Napoleon's sister), who invited him to Florence and to Pisa, where he gave instruction in modelling at the court. In December 1814 Pistrucci went to Paris, where he was visited by several amateurs of camoos. He made a model in wax of Napoleon, kept it in his pocket to compare with the original when he appeared in public, and at last completed a portrait which was considered 'extremely like' (BILLING, fig. 115).

In 1815 he journeyed to London, and he complains that he and his stock of cameos and models were very roughly treated at the Dover custom-house. In London he modelled the portrait of Sir Joseph Banks, and at Banks's house encountered Richard Payne Knight [q. v.], who had called to show a fragmentary cameo (BILLING, fig. 121) of 'Flora' (or Persephone) purchased by Knight as an antique from the dealer Bonelli for 1001, (some accounts say five hundred and two hundred and fifty guineas). Pistrucci at once explained to Knight that he himself had made it for Bonelli about six years previously at Rome for less than 51., and that (like all his productions) it bore his private mark. Knight angrily asserted that the cameo was antique, and declared to Banks that the wreath was not of roses, but of an extinct species of pomegranate blos-Banks examined it and exclaimed, 'By God, they are roses—and I am a botanist.' This incident drew the attention of collectors to Pistrucci, and he began to be patronised, especially by William Richard Hamilton, vice-president of the Society of Antiquaries, for whom he made another 'Flora' cameo. Knight's 'Flora' (or Persephone) came to the British Museum as part of the Payne Knight bequest; and Knight, in his manuscript catalogue of his gems, persists in describing the wreath as of pomegranate blossoms-'non rosas, ut B. Pistrucci gemmarum sculptor, qui lapidem hunc se suft manu scalpsisse gloriatus est, prædicaverat, et se eas ad vivum imitando expressisse, pari stultitia et impudentia asseruit.

Banks paid Pistrucci fifty guineas for making him a jasper cameo of the head of George III, and in 1816 sent him with it to Wellesley Pole, the master of the mint. Pole directed Thomas Wyon, junior, the chief engraver, to copy it on the half-crown; but the work proved inferior to the model, and was afterwards rejected. Pistrucci showed Pole the wax model for a gem, with the subject of St. George and the Dragon, that he had made for a 'George' to be worn by Earl Spencer, K.G. The design was considered suitable as a reverse-type for the new gold coinage, and Pole paid Pistrucci one hundred guineas for making, as a model for the coins, a jasper cameo with this subject. The design (still retained) does not, strictly speaking, owe its origin to Pistrucci. can be traced back to a shell-cameo, the Bataille coquille, in the collection of the Duke of Orleans. This was copied, at least in part, by (liovanni Pikler, whose intaglio with the subject became popular in Rome. Pistrucci himself, when in Italy, had made four copies (two cameos and two gems) of Pikler's intaglio, and on coming to London in 1815 employed the subject for Lord Spencer's George. In making the jasper cameo as the model for the coins, he, however, considerably modified the design, and modelled the St. George from the life—the original being an Italian servant belonging to the hotel (Brunet's) in Leicester Square, where Pistrucci was staying. The design first appeared on the sovereign of 1817, and subequently on the crown of George IV, which Denon, the director of the French mint, called the handsomest coin in Europe.

During the manufacture of the new coinage during 1816 Pistrucci was employed at the mint as an outside assistant. On 22 Sept. 1817 Thomas Wyon [q. v.] died, and Pole offered Pistrucci the post of chief engraver. The appointment was resisted by the 'moneyers' (the corporation of the mint), and for several years Pistrucci was attacked and calumniated in the 'Times' and other newspapers, chiefly on the ground of his foreign origin. Hu found a staunch defender in W. R. Hamilton. The office of chief engraver was kept in abeyance, though Pistrucci continued to perform the duties. At last, in 1828, as a compromise. William Wyon, the second engraver at the mint, was made chief engraver, and Pistrucci received the designation of 'chief medallist.' Pistrucci engraved part of the coinage at the end of George III's reign, corrected the engraving of the matrices and punches of the silver coins dated '1815-17,' and engraved the coins of the early part of George IV's reign. In 1820–21 he engraved the coronation medal of George IV, and obtained sittings from the king, after refusing to copy Sir Thomas Lawrence's portrait of George. In 1821, when required to execute a medal commemorating the royal visit to Ireland, he refused to copy the king's bust by Sir Francis Chantrey, and in 1822 declined to reproduce this bust on the coins. He had no share in producing the coronation medal of William IV, as he again refused to copy a bust by Chantrey. The coronation medal of Victoria, which was hastily executed by Pistrucci in three months, gave general dissatisfaction.

In 1838 Pistrucci, on the recommendation of Samuel Rogers, made the silver seal of the duchy of Lancaster. The work was finished in the short space of fifteen days by a process which Pistrucci claimed to have invented, and by which a punch or die could be cast in metal from the artist's wax or clay model, instead of being copied from it with graving tools, as had hitherto been usual (Weddle, Medals and Medallions, 1894). The originality of this process (which has since been adopted by medallists) was disputed at the time by John Baddeley (Mechanics' Magazine, xxvii. 401), who claimed that it had been practised fifty years before by his grandfather at the Soho mint; but Pistrucci's claim was defended by William Baddeley (ib. xxviii. 36) and others (cf. Num. Journal, ii. 111 f.; Num. Chron. i. 53, 123 f., 230 f.) About 1824 Pistrucci's work on the coins had come to an end, but he continued to reside at the mint till 1849, when he went to live at Fine Arts Cottage, Old Windsor, subsequently moving to Flora Lodge, Englefield Green, near Windsor.

His sight remaining good, he continued his work on cameos. During his residence at the mint he had been permitted to make and sell cameos for his own benefit, and obtained high prices. He worked both in cameo and intaglio, but his intaglios are now very rare. He also devoted some time to sculpture, and made busts of several London friends, of the Duke of Wellington (now in the United Service Museum), and of Pozzo di Borgo. In 1850 he delivered to the master of the mint the matrices of the famous Waterloo medallion which he had been commissioned to undertake for the mint as early as 1817. He had for years worked at it in his leisure time, but the dies were never hardened, though impressions in soft metal and electrotypes were taken and sold to the public. For this medallion he was paid 3,500%, on the calculation that it required as much work as thirty or more ordinary medals, for which Pistrucci's usual charge was 100%.

The latter years of Pistrucci's life were tranquil and happy. He died at Flora Lodge, near Windsor, on 16 Sept. 1855, of inflammation of the lungs. He was chosen by the committee a member of the Athenaum Club in 1842, and received diplomas from the academy of St. Luke at Rome, from the Royal Academy of Arts at Copenhagen, and from the Institute of France. Pistrucci married, about 1802, a sister of Jacopo Folchi. the physician, and daughter of a rich Roman merchant. He had several children, of whom the two younger daughters, Elena and Maria Elisa (the latter married to Signor Marsuzi), attained reputation in Rome as cameoengravers. One of the sons, Camillo, was a pupil of Thorwaldsen, and was employed by the papal government in the restoration of ancient statues. Pistrucci's elder brother Philip engraved skilfully on copper, and had a talent for musical and poetical improvisations. Thomas Moore (Diary, iv. 71) mentions one of these entertainments that he witnessed at Lady Jersey's.

Pistrucci, in his interesting autobiography (written about 1820 and translated in Billing's 'Science of Gems'), describes himself as 'very excitable, and unfortunately very proud with the artists of my own era.' He was persevering and laborious, and often worked for fifteen hours a day. As a gemengraver his reputation stands high, but subjects from the antique of the kind that delighted the collectors of his day will hardly again find favour. His work as a medallist has, in some points, been severely criticised -for instance, his 'wiry' treatment of hair. Yet lie undoubtedly imparted to our coinage a distinction of style that had long been absent from it. To Pistrucci is due the partial substitution on the reverses of English coins of a subject-design for a merely heraldic device. His medals are not very numerous or important, with the exception of the Waterloo medallion, which is full of beauty and delicacy in detail, though it betrays its piecemeal composition in a certain lack of vigour and harmony as a whole. The statements that Pistrucci cut steel matrices for the coins with a lapidary's wheel and that he was taught die-engraving by the Wyons appear to be unfounded.

Pistrucci's works (omitting some already mentioned) are chiefly as follows:

Coins. Gold. 1. Sovereign of George III, 1817, 1818, 1820. 2. Pattern five-pound piece of George III, 1820. Only twenty-five were struck, and it is said that Pistrucci, on hearing of the death of George III, gave hasty orders for the striking off of a few specimens. 3. Pattern double-sovereign of George III, 1820. About sixty were struck (OROWTHER, Engl. Pattern Coins, p. 87). 4. Sovereign of George IV, and the reverse of the double-sovereign. Silver. 5. Crown of George III, 1818-20. 6. Pattern crown of George III. 7. Crown of George IV, 1821, 1822. Pistrucci's models in red jasper for the crown, shilling, and sovereign of George III are in the collection of the Royal Mint (Cat. of Coins and Tokens, Nos. 991-3).

MEDALS. 1. Coronation medal of George IV (official), 1821. 2. Lord Maryborough (Wellesley Pole) 1823. 8. George IV, rev. trident and dolphins; made for Rundell and Bridge, 1824. 4. Frederick, duke of York, medal and miniature medals, 1827. 5. Sir Gilbert Blane (the Blane naval medical modal), 1830. 6. Coronation medal of Victoria (official), 1838. 7. Coronation of Victoria, rev. 'Da facilem cursum;' made for Rundell and Bridge, 1838. 8. Duke of Rundell and Bridge, 1888. Wellington, rev. helmet, 1841. 9. Hon. John Chetwynd Talbot (specimen in Guldhall Library), 1853. 10. Design for Waterloo medallion, 1817-50 (photographed BILLING, Nos. 143, 144).

Pistrucci 'directed' the 'long-service' military medals of William IV and Victoria, as well as W.J. Taylor's medal of Taylor Combe [q. v.], 1826. Pistrucci's wax model of Combe's portrait was in the possession of Dr. Gray of the British Museum, and a plaster cast of it is now in the medal room, British Museum. Pistrucci also made a portrait medallion of Joseph Planta [q. v.] of the British Museum, which was engraved by W. Sharp, and published in 1817 by W. Clarke of New Bond Street. A wax medallion by Pistrucci of Matthew Boulton (d. 1809) is in the medal room (Brit. Mus.) Pistrucci also made a wax model of the portrait of Dr. Anthony Fothergill, which he submitted as a design for the Fothergillian medal of the Royal Humane Society in 1837. On the auggestion that he should use another artist's design, Pistrucci refused to execute the medal, and, when the secretary of the society called on him, practically had him turned out of the mint. Pistrucci's signature on coins and medals is 'B. P.' and 'PISTRUCCI.'

CAMEOS. 1. Duke of York. 2. Medusa in red jasper (sold for two hundred guineas). 3. A St. Andrew and Cross on Oriental sardonyx for Lord Lauderdale (three hundred and fifty guineas). 4. Cameos of Victoria as princess and as queen. 5. Young Bacchus, cornelian onyx (three hundred guineas). 6. Medusa, sardonyx. 7. 'Force subdued by Love and Beauty' (two hundred guineas). 8. Minerva, cameo, four inches in diameter (five hundred guineas). 9. Siris bronzes, copy in cameo (two hundred and fifty guineas). 10. Cameo of Augustus and Livia in sapphirine (fetched only 30% at the Hertz sale, but Pistrucci was paid 8001.) Many of these and other productions of Pistrucci are photographed in Billing's 'Science of Gems."

[Pistrucci's Autobiography; Billing's Science of Goms; collection of newspaper cuttings in Brit. Mus. Library relating to Pistrucci and W. Wyon; memoir in Gent. Mag. 1856, pt. i. pp. 653 f.; Wober's Medals and Medallions... by Foreign Artists; Numismatic works of Hawkins, Kenyon, and Ruding; King's works on Gems; Brit. Mus. collection of coins and medals; information kindly given by Mr. H. A. Grueber, F.S.A., and by Dr. F. Parkos Weber, F.S.A.] W. W.

PITCAIRN. [See also PITCAIRND.]

PITCAIRN, DAVID, M.D. (1749-1809), physician, born on 1 May 1749 in Fifeshire, was eldest son of Major John Pitcairn, who was killed at the battle of Bunker's Hill. Robert Pitcairn (1747?-1770?) [q.v.] was his brother. He was sent to the high school of Edinburgh, thence to the university of Glasgow, and after some years to the university of Edinburgh, from which he went in 1773 to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.B. in 1779 and M.D. in 1784. In 1779 he began practice in London, and was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians on 15 Aug. 1785. He was five times censor, and in 1788 was also Gulstonian lecturer and Harveian orator. On the resignation of his uncle, William Pitcairn [q. v.], he was, on 10 Feb. 1780, elected physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and held office till 1793, when he resigned. He rapidly attained a large private practice. Dr. John Latham, M.D. [q. v.], mentions, in his treatise on gout and rheumatism, that David Pitcairn was the first to discover that valvular disease of the heart was a frequent result of rheumatic fever, and that he published his discovery in his teaching at St. Bartholomew's Hospital. On 11 April 1782 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. He had frequent attacks of quinsy, and failing health, accompanied by hemo-ptysis, in 1798, forced him to give up work and spend eighteen months in Portugal. He returned to England and continued to practise, but on 13 April 1809 had an attack of sore throat, followed by acute inflammation of the larynx, with consequent cedema of the glottis, of which he died on 17 April 1809, at Craig's Court, Charing Cross. Dr. Matthew Baillie [q.v.], who had lived in intimate friendship with him for thirty years, attended him, and has described his case, with the similar one of Sir John Machamara Hayes [q. v.], who died of the same disease three months Pitcairn's body was examined by Sir Benjamin Collins Brodie the elder [q. v. in the presence of Matthew Baillie, Everard Home, and W. O. Wells.

He was buried in the family vault in the church of St. Bartholomew the Less, without the walls of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London. A tablet to his memory was erected in the church of Hadham Magns, Hertfordshire. His portrait, by Hoppner, is in the College of Physicians, and shows him to have been a handsome man, with a peculiarly frank and open countenance. Hemarried Elizabeth, daughter of William Almack, and she bequeathed this picture to the college. There is a good engraving of it by Bragg.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys. ii. 363; MacMichael's Gold-headed Cane, London, 1828; Latham's Rheumatism and Gout, London, 1796; manuscript minute-book of St. Bartholomew's Hospital; M. Baillie in Transactions of a Society for the Improvement of Medical and Chirurgical Knowledge, London, 1812, vol. iii.] N. M.

PITCAIRN, ROBERT (1520?-1584), commendator of Dunfermline and Scottish secretary of state, born about 1520, was descended from the Pitcairns of Pitcairn in Fife. The name of Piers de Pitcairn appears on the Ragman Roll as swearing fealty to Edward I in 1296; and Nisbet had seen charters of the family as far back as 1417 (Remarks on the Rayman Roll, p. 36). The commendator was, however, descended from a younger branch of the family, being the son of David Pitcairn, not of Pitcairn, as usually stated, but of Forthar-Ramsay in the barony of Airdrie, Fifeshire, and his wife Elizabeth Dury or Durio (Reg. Mag. Sig. Scot. 1546-80, entry 667). On 22 Jan. 1551-2 his father sold to him the lands of Forthar (ib.) He was educated for the church, and became commendator of Dunfermline, in succession to George Durie, in 1561. Occasionally his name appears in letters and contemporary documents as abbot, but he was only so by courtesy, the office having ceased to exist with the abolition of the religious houses. He was also archdeacon of St. Andrews.

Pitcairn was one of those summoned on 19 July 1565 to a meeting of the privy council as extraordinary members, to take into consideration a declaration of the Earl of Moray as to a conspiracy against his life, at Perth (Reg. P. C. Scotl. i. 311). On 19 Oct. of the same year he was appointed keeper of the havens of Limekilns and North Queensferry, with the bounds adjacent thereto (ib. p. 381). He is erroneously stated by Keith (Hist. ii. 540) to have been one of Argyll's assessors at the trial of Bothwell. After the surrender of Queen Mary at Carborry Hill on 15 June 1567, he was chosen a lord of the articles; and on 29 July he was present at the coronation of the young king, James VI, in the kirk of Stirling (Reg. P. C. Scotl. i. 537). On 2 June 1568 he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session; and in September of the same year was chosen one of the principal commissioners to accompany the regent Moray to the conference with the English commissioners at York in reference to the charges against Queen Mary. He was present in the same capacity at Westminster and Hampton Court. At the Perth convention, in July 1569, he voted against the queen's divorce from Bothwell (Reg. P. C. Scott. ii. 8); and in September he was sent to London to acquaint Elizabeth with the various negotiations connected with Mary's proposed marriage to Norfolk (Cal. State Papers, For. Ser. 1569-1571, entries 420, 457; Hinning, Memoirs, pp. 117, 119). Some time after the assassination of the regent Moray he was, in May 1570, again sent ambassador to Elizabeth to know her pleasure in reference to the future government of the realm, and to ask for aid in 'repression of the troubles' (Cal. State Papers, For. Scr. 1569-71, entries 671, 927); but his mission met with indifferent success.

On his return to Scotland Lennov was chosen regent, and, as this election caused Maitland [see MAITLAND, WILLIAM, 1528? 1573] finally to sever himself from the king's party, Pitcaun was chosen to succeed him In November of the same as secretary. year he was again sent on an embassy to England (ib. entries 1393, 1404); and he was also chosen to accompany Morton on an embassy, in the following February, to oppose proposals that had been made for Mary's restoration to her throne (ib. entry 1518; HERRICS, p. 131). Along with Morton, he was also sent, in November 1571, to treat with Lord Hunsdon and other English commissioners at Berwick for an offensive and defensive league with England, the chief purpose being to obtain aid from Elizabeth against the party of Queen Mary in the castle of Edinburgh (Cal. State Papers, For. Ser. 1569-71, entry 2133). The negotiations were successful, and on their return the Scottish emissaries received the special thanks of the privy council (Reg. P. C. Scotl. ii. 99). Pitcairn enjoyed so much of the confidence of Morton that he was entrusted by him with the delicate duty of conducting negotiations with the English ambassador Killigrew in regard to the proposal for delivering Mary to the Scottish government with a view to her execution (cf. especially Proofs and Illustrations, No. xxiv to vol. iii. of TYTLDR'S Hist. of Scotland, ed. 1864). He was frequently employed in negotiations with the defenders of the castle of Edinburgh, and was one of the commissioners for the pacification, with Huntly and the Hamiltons, at Perth in February 1572-3 (Reg. P. C. Scotl. ii. 193).

Notwithstanding his close association with Morton, Pitcairn was a party to the conspiracy against him in 1578; and he was one of the new council of twolve chosen after Morton's fall to govern in the name of the king (Moysin, Memoirs, p. 6; Caldinwood, Hist. iii. 397). On 27 June he was, 'in respect of his ability and experience,' chosen as ambassador to Elizabeth to thank her for the favour shown to the king 'in his younger age,' and to confirm and renew the league between the realms (Reg. P. C. Scotl. ii. 707-8). On his return he was declared to have 'truly, honestly, and dligently performed and discharged his charge,' and this declaration was ordered to be embodied in an act 'ad perpetuam rei memoriam' (ib.

iii. 23). On 20 May 1579 he was appointed one of a committee for the sighting of the Lennox papers (ib. p. 163); on 8 Aug. one of a commission for enforcing the act of parliament for the reformation of the universities, with special reference to the university of St. Andrews (ib. pp. 199-200); and on 23 April one of the arbiters in reference to the feud between the clans of Gordon and Forbes (ib. p. 279). Along with other chief persons of the realm, he signed the second confession of faith, commonly called the king's confession, at Edinburgh, 28 Jan. 1580-1 (Calderwood, iii. 501). He was one of a commission appointed on 15 July following to hear the suit of Sir James Bal-four (d. 1583) [q. v.] and report to the king (Reg. P. C. Scott. iii. 403). Although latterly an opponent of Morton, the sympathies of the commendator were with the protestant party, and he had a principal share in the con-trivance of the raid of Ruthven on 23 Aug. 1582, by which the ascendency of Lennox and Arran in the king's counsels was for the time overthrown. On 11 Jan. following the keepers of the great seal were ordered, under pain of rebellion, to append the great seal to the gift of the abbacy of Dunfermline to Henry Pitcairn, son of the commendator's brother, reserving the life-rent to the commendator. This was to insure that the nephew would succeed, the gift having been made in recognition of the long and true service of the commendator to the king since his coronation ' (ib. iii. 543). On 26 April the commendator was appointed assessor to the treasurer, the Earl of Gowrie.

The commendator used the utmost endeayours to prevent the counter-revolution at St. Andrews on 24 June 1583; and, while seeming to favour the king's proposal for a convention of the nobility there, he 'gave the king counsel to let none of the lords come within the castle accompanied with more than twelve persons.' This crafty counsel,' says Sir James Melville, 'being followed, the next morning the castle was full of men for them of the contrary party well armed,' who would again have made themselves masters of the king but for the immediate arrival of various gentlemen from Fife (Memoirs, pp. 288-9). For some time after the counter-revolution the commendator remained at court. Finding his position insecure, he endeavoured to retain the king's favour by bribing Colonel Stewart, captain of the guard, to whom he presented a velvet purse containing thirty-four pound-pieces of gold. The colonel, however, informed the king of the gift, representing that the purse had been sont to bribe him to betray the king. He further distributed the gold pieces among thirty of the guard, 'who bored them and set them like targets upon their knapsacks, and the purse was born upon a spearpoint like an ensign' on the march from Perth to Falkland (ib. p. 292; Calderwood, iii. 721-2). Arran having shortly afterwards arrived at Falkland, where the king then was, the commendator was sent into ward in the castle of Lochleven: but on 23 Sept. he was set at liberty upon caution to remain in Dunfermline, or within six miles of it, under pain of 10,000l. (CALDERWOOD, iii. 780). During the winter of 1583-4 he set sail to Flanders (ib. viii. 270). He returned to Scotland in a precarious state of health on 12 Sept. 1584, and obtained license to remain in Limekilns, near Dunfermline (ib. p. 725). He died on 18 Oct. following, in his sixtyfourth year. In the entry in the records of the privy council, representing him as having died before 25 April 1584 (Reg. P. C. iii. 755), the date 1584 seems to be a mistake for 1585. Nor did he die in exile, as stated in the preface to the volume (p. lxvii).

After his death the grants made by him out of the abbacy were revoked, on the ground that he was 'suspect culpable' of treason and had greatly dilapidated his benefices (ib. pp. 711-12); but after the extrusion of the master of Gray from the abbacy in 1587, Pitcairn's nephew Henry entered into possession of it. The commendator was buried in the north aisle of the church of Dunfermline, where he is commemorated in a laudatory Latin epitaph as the 'hope and pillar of his country.' Pitcairn is supposed to have been the author of the inscription on the abbot's house, on the south side of Maygate Street,

Dunfermline:

Sen vord is thrall and thocht is free, Keep veill thye tonge, I counsel the.

[Histories by Buchanan, Calderwood, and Spotiswood; Cal. State Papers, For. Ser., reign of Elizabeth; Herries's Memoirs (Abbotsford Club); Hist. of James the Sext, Melville's Memoirs, and Moysie's Memoirs (all in the Bannatyne Club); Rog. Mag. Sig. Scot. 1646–80; Reg. P. C. Scotl. vols. i.—iii.; Chalmers's Hist. of Dunfermline.]

PITCAIRN, ROBERT (1747?-1770?), midshipman, son of Major John Pitcairn of the marines, killed in the battle of Bunker's Hill, was born in Edinburgh about 1747. David Pitcairn [q.v.] was his younger brother. On 15 July 1766 he was entered as a midshipman on board the Swallow, then fitting out for a voyage of discovery under Captain Philip Carteret [q.v.] According to the Swallow's pay-book, he was then nineteen.

On Thursday, 2 July 1767, the Swallow sighted an island in the Pacific, according to their reckoning, in latitude 20° 2′ S. and longitude 133° 21′ W. 'It is so high,' wrote Captain Carteret, 'that we saw it at the distauce of more than fifteen leagues; and it having been discovered by a young gentleman, son to Major Pitcairn of the marines . . . we called it Pitcairn's Island.' The Swallow paid off in May 1769, and Pitcairn appears to have joined the Aurora, which sailed from England on 30 Sept. touching at the Cape of Good Hope she was never heard of, and it was supposed that she went down in a cyclone near Mauritius in January or February 1770. Pitcairn's name does not appear in her pay-book, but it is quito possible that he was entered very shortly before she sailed, and was not reported to the admiralty, or that he was a supernumerary for disposal. Carteret stated that Pitcairn was lost in her in a subsequently published 'Journal' of the voyage of the Swallow. The island which Pitcairn discovered could not afterwards be found, the reported latitude and longitude being erroneous; but it has been very generally, and no doubt correctly, identified with the island to which the mutineers of the Bounty retired in 1789, and where the survivors and their descendants were found in 1808 and again in 1814 [see Adams, John, 1760?-1829]. This is now known as Pitcairn Island.

[Carteret's Journal in Hawkesworth's Voyages, J. K. L.

PITCAIRN, ROBERT (1793-1855), antiquary and miscellaneous writer, second son of Robert Pitcairn, W.S., was born in Edinburgh in 1793. After a sound general education, he was apprenticed to William Patrick. writer to the signet, Edinburgh, and was admitted writer to the signet on 21 Nov. He was long an assistant to Thomas Thomson, deputy clerk register in her majesty's register house, and in 1853 he was appointed one of the four official searchers of records for incumbrances in that institution. In 1838 appeared an elaborate and exhaustive treatuse by Pitcairn, entitled 'Trials and other Proceedings in Matters Criminal before the High Court of Justice in Scotland,'8 vols. 4to. Pitcairn's antiquarian tastes and literary bias commended him to Scott, who was stimulated by one of the narratives in his 'Criminal Trials' to write his 'Ayrshire Tragedy' (LOCKHART, Life of Scott, vii. 202). Scottroviewed the earlier portion of Pitcairn's massive work in the 'Quarterly Review' for 1831, lauding his friend's 'enduring and patient toil,' and thanking him for his 'self-denying exertions' in producing 'a most extraordinary picture of manners, calculated to bo 'highly valuable in a philosophical point of view, and containing much that would 'greatly interest the juriet and the moralist' (Scott, Miscellaneous Prose Works, vol. axi.) Pitcairn died suddenly of heart-disease in Edinburgh on 11 July 1855. On 4 Sept. 1830 Pitcaum married Hester Hine, daughter of Henry Hunt, merchant.

London.

An industrious and accurate worker, Pitcairn also published; 1. 'Collections relative to the Funeralls of Mary Queen of Scots, 1822. 2. An edition of 'Chronicon Comobii Sanctso Crucis Edinburgensis, 1828 (Bannatyne Club). 3. 'Families of the Name of Kennedy, 1830. 4. James Melvill's Diary, 1842, [Edinburgh Evening Courant, 12 July 1855; Scotsman, 14 July 1855; Lockhart's Life of Scott; Hist. of the Society of Writers to H. M. Signet; information from Mr. G. Stronach, Advocates' Library, Edinburgh.]

PITCAIRN, WILLIAM, M.D. (1711-1791), physician, eldest son of David Pitcairn, minister of Dysart, Fifeshire, was born at Dysart in 1711. He studied at the university of Leyden, where he entered on the physic line on 15 Oct. 1734, and attended the lectures of Boerhaave. He took the degree of M.D. at Rheims. His mother, Catherine, belonged to the Hamilton family, and he became private tutor to James, sixth duke of Hamilton, stayed with him at Oxford, and travelled abroad with him in 1742. The university of Oxford gave him the degree of M.D. at the opening of the Radcliffe Library in April 1749. Soon after he began practice in London, and was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians on 25 June 1750. In 1752 he was Gulstonian lecturer, and in 1758, 1755, 1759, and 1762 a censor. He was elected president in 1775, and every year till he resigned in 1785. He was elected physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital on 22 Feb. 1750, and resigned on 3 Feb. 1780. He lived in Warwick Court, near the old College of Physicians in Warwick Lane, in the city of London, and had a very large practice as a physician. On 4 March 1784 he was elected treasurer of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and thenceforward lived in the treasurer's house in the hospital. He had a country residence, with a botanical garden of five acres, in Upper Street, Islington. He was long remembered in St. Bartholomew's, where a ward is still called after him. His sagacious use of opium in fevers was remarkable, and in enteric fever, the entity of which was not then recognised, he no doubt saved many lives which had otherwise been lost by diarrho.a or by homorrhage. He died at Islington on 25 Nov. 1791, and was buried in a vault in the church of St. Bartholomew the Less, within the hospital walls, 1 Dec. 1791. His portrait, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, is in the censor's room at the College of Physicians; it was engraved by John Jones in 1777. Another engraved portrait, by Hedges, is mentioned by Brom-ley. Pitcairn received Radcliffe's gold-headed cane from Anthony Askew [q.v.], and his arms are engraved upon it.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys ii. 174; The Goldheaded Cane, London, 1827; Norman Moore's Brief Relation of the Past and Present State of St. Bartholomew's Hospital; Original Minute Books of St. Bartholomew's Hospital.] N. M.

PITCAIRNE, ARCHIBALD (1652-1713), physician and poet, was born in Edinburgh on 25 Dec. 1652. His father, Alexander Pitcairne, a merchant and magistrate of Edinburgh, claimed descent from the old family of Pitcairne, Fifeshire; and his mother, whose name was Sydserf, was connected with a family in Haddingtonshire descended from the Sydseris of Rutlaw. After attending the school of Dalkeith, he in 1668 entered the university of Edinburgh, where in 1671 he graduated M.A. The intention of his father was that he should study for the church, but ultimately he was permitted to enter on the study of the law, which he did, first in Edinburgh, and afterwards in Paris. At Paris he made the acquaintance of several medical students; and, becoming interested in their studies, began to attend the hospitals along with them. Returning to Edinburgh, he was induced by Dr. David Gregory (1661-1708) [q. v.], his intimate friend, to begin the study of mathematics, in which he acquired exceptional proficiency. His mathematical studies did not divert his attention from medicine, but his mathematical bent more or less influenced his medical theories and investigations. About 1675 he resumed his medical studies in Paris, and in August 1680 he obtained the degree of M.D. from the faculty of Rheims. Shortly afterwards he commenced practice as a physician in Edinburgh, and he was one of the original members of the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, incorporated in 1681. When an attempt was made to found a medical school in the university of Edinburgh in 1685, Pitcairne and Dr. Halkett were chosen soon after the appointment of Sir Robert Sibbald [q. v.] (LAUDER OF FOUNTAINHALL, Historical Notices, p. 660), but it is supposed that Pitcsirne never delivered any lectures.

In 1658 Pitcairne published, at Edinburgh, 'Solutio Problematis de Historicis; seu de Inventoribus Dissertatio, of which an en-larged edition appeared at Leyden in 1693. This pamphlet, in which he vindicated the claims of Harvey to the discovery of the circulation of the blood, gained him so high reputation that in 1692 the council of the university of Leyden invited him to fill the chair of physic there. As his extreme Jacobite sympathies were proving somewhat prejudicial to his success in Edinburgh, he accepted the invitation, his inaugural lecture being delivered on 26 April. It was published, under the title 'Oratio, qua ostenditur Medicinam ab omni philosophandi secta esse liberam, Leyden, 1692; Edinburgh, 1713. He also published, at Leyden, 'De Sanguinis Cırculatione in animalibus genitis et non genitis,' 1693. At Leyden he delivered a course of lectures on the works of Dellini; but, according to Bayle, their abstruse and mathematical character detracted from their popularity (Œuvres, iv. 737). Partly, perhaps, on this account, as well as owing to the fact that the lady who was about to become his second wife was disinclined to settle at Leyden, he in 1693 resigned his chair there, and returned to Edinburgh.

Soon after his return to Edinburgh Pitcairne became involved in various medical controversies, the bit torness of which was as much owing to political as to scientific antipathies. In 1695 he was severely attacked in a volume entitled 'Apollo Mathematicus, or the Art of curing Diseases by the Mathematics, a work both profitable and pleasant; to which is added a Discourse of Certainty according to the Principles of the same Author. The work was supposed to have been written by Dr. (afterwards Sir Edward) Eyzat. The same year there appeared 'Tarrago unmasked, or an Answer to a late Pamphlet entitled "Apollo Mathematicus, by George Heplurn, M.D., and Member of the College at Edinburgh," to which is added by Dr. Pitcairne "The Theory of the Internal Diseases of the Eye demonstrated mathematically."' For this pamphlet Dr. Hepburn, apupil of Pitcairne, was suspended from the exercise of his right to sit and vote as a member of the College of Physicians. On 18 Nov. Pitcairne tendered a protest against the admission of certain fellows, including Dr. Eyzat, as having been irregularly elected; but on the 22nd the committee to whom the matter had been referred reported that the protestation given in and subscribed by Pitcairne was 'a calumnious, scandalous, false and arrogant paper,' and he was suspended 'from voting in the college or sitting in any meeting thereof.' Several others who had anonymous pamphlet, entitled 'Epistola adhered to the protest of Pitcairne were also suspended. One object of this procedure was said to have been to influence the election of president for the ensuing year. Dr. Trotter was elected, but Pitcairne and his party withdrew to the house of Sir Alexander Stevenson, and there proceeded to elect Stevenson president. The quarrel led to the publication of a pamphlet entitled 'Information for Dr. Archibald Pitcairne against the appointed Professor, or a Mathematical Demonstration that Liars should have good Memories, wherein the College of Physicians is vindicatedfrom Calumnies, &c., 1696. Ultimately, however, an act of oblivion was passed on 4 June, and confirmed on the 11th and 12th, after which Pitcairne resumed his seat in the college.

On 2 Aug. 1699 Pitcairne received the degree of M.D. from the university of Aberdeen, and on 16 Oct. 1701 he was admitted a fellow of the College of Surgeons, Edinburgh. In 1695 he published at Edinburgh, 'Dissertatio de Curatione Febrium, que per evacuationes instituitur;' and in 1696, also at Edinburgh, 'Dissertatio de Legibus Historia Naturalis.' In 1701 his medical dissertations appeared at Rotterdam in one volume, under the title 'Archibaldi Pitcarnii Scoti Dissertationes Medicæ,' dedicated to Lorenzo Bellini, professor at Pisa, who had dedicated to him his 'Opuscula.' A new and enlarged edition appeared at Edinburgh in 1713, under the title 'Archibaldi Pitcarnii Scoti Dissertationes Medico, quarum multer nunc primum prodeunt. Subjuncta est Thoma Boeri, M.D., ad Archibaldum Pitcarnium Epistola, qua respondetur libello Astrucii Franci.'

Chiefly on account of his mockery—often by somewhat indecorous jests-of the puritanical strictness of the presbyterian kirk, Pitcairne became strongly suspected of being at heartan atheist; a suspicion which, if verified, would have entailed on him social ostracism. His religious opinions seem to have differed considerably from those dominant in Scotland at that time; but, although accustomed to ridicule both the calvinism of the kirk and current notions as to the inspiration of scripture, he demurred to be classed as an unbeliever. 'He was,'says Wodrow, 'a professed doist, and by many alleged to be an atheist, though he has frequently professed his belief of a God, and said he could not deny a providence. However, he was a great mocker at religion, and ridiculer of it. He keeped no public society for worship, and on the Sabbath had his set meeting for ridiculing of the scriptures and sermons '(Analesta, ii. 255). He was the supposed author of an Denestone, on The King and Queen of Fairy, Archimedis ad regem Gelonem Alba Grace, reperta anno æræ Christianæ 1688,' which was made the subject of a lecture by Thomas Halyburton in 1710, published in 1713 at Edinburgh, under the title 'Natural Religion insufficient and Revealed necessary.' While at a book-sale, Pitcairne, commenting on the difficulty of obtaining offers for a certain copy of the scriptures, jocularly remarked that it was no wonder it remained on their hands, for 'verbum Dei manot in æternum.' On account of the jest he was denounced by a Mr. Webster as an atheist, whereupon he raised an action against his libeller in the court of session, but the matter was finally settled by an arrangement (ib. iii. 307). Pitcairne is the supposed author of 'The Assembly, or Scotch Reformation: a Comedy as it was acted by the Persons in the Drama, done from the original Transcript written in the year 1692,' London, 1722; and of 'Babel, a satirical Poem, written originally in the Irish tongue, and translated into Scotch for the benefite of the Leidges, by A. P., a wellwisher to the Cause,' 1692. Both are of some historical interest, from their witty, if occasionally rihald, satirical sketches of the leading Scottish divines of the period. His antipathy to the presbyterian ministers is partly to be traced to his strong Jacobite sympathies. In a private letter to a physician in London he made some unguarded remarks in reference to a petition for assembling a parliament, and, the letter having been intercepted, he was on 25 July 1700 brought before the council; but, on acknowledging his fault in writing the letter, which he said he had done in his cups, and without any design of ridiculing the government, he was absolved, after a reprimand from the lord chancellor.

Besides his satirical verses on the kirk, Pitcairne was the author of a considerable number of Latin verses, a selection from which was published by Thomas Ruddiman [q. v.] in a volume entitled 'Selecta Poemata Archibaldi Pitcarnii et aliorum, Edinburgh, 1727. Apart from their intrinsic merit, the poems are of value from their contemporary allusions. Some of those have been explained in Irving's 'Memoirs of Buchanan' (App. No. xii), and by Lord Hales in the Edinburgh Magazine and Review '(i. 255). A collection of jeux d'esprit which Pitcairne occasionally printed for private circulation was made by Archibald Constable the publisher, but the collection cannot now be traced. In Donaldson's 'Collection' there is a poem by Pit-cairne, under the assumed name of Walter in two versions, Latin and English. His Latin epitaph on Graham of Claverhouse, viscount Dundee, was translated by Dryden (Works, ed. Scott, xi. 114), and Scott remarks regarding it that it will hardly be disputed that the original is much superior to the translation, though the last be written by Dryden.

Pitcairne died at Edinburgh on 20 Oct. 1713, and was buried in the Greyfriars churchyard, where there is a monument with a Latin inscription to his memory. By his first wife, Margaret, daughter of Colonel James Hay of Pitfour, he had a son and daughter, who died in infancy. By his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Archibald Stevenson, he had one son and four daughters. The son, before attaining his majority, engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and was confined in the Tower; but, through the intercession of Dr. Mead with Walpole, he obtained his release. He then entered the Dutch service, but died soon afterwards. The second daughter. Jane, married Alexander, fifth earl of Kellie.

Pitcairne was one of the most celebrated physicians of his time, and, on the whole, his merits equalled his reputation. He was a very successful practitioner, and acquired a large income, but spent his money freely, a considerable part of it in charity, and died poor. The statements as to his indulgence in drink are probably exaggerated, his convivial habits being at variance with the puritanism of the period. He succeeded in 1004 in persuading the town council to agree to his offer to wait without fee on the sick poor who were without relatives, on condition that he afterwards obtained their bodies for dissection. Although too much influenced by mechanical theories, he had no inconsiderable share in promoting the advancement of medical science, the popularity of his publications being enhanced by his literary style and power of clear exposi-tion. His library, said to have been one of the best private collections of the period, was purchased after his death by the emperor of Russia. His portrait, by Medina, is in the College of Surgeons at Edinburgh. It has been engraved by Strange (cf. Brow-

An English translation of Pitcairne's medical dissertations appeared in London in 1717, under the title 'The whole Works of Dr. Archibald Pitcairne, published by himself; wherein are discovered the true Foundation and Principles of the Art of Physics, with Cases and Observations upon most Distempers and Medicines. Done from the Latin original by George Sewel, M.D., and J.S.

Desaguliers, LL.D. and F.R.S., with some Additions.' The same year there was also published at London 'Archibaldi Pitcarnii, medici celeberrimi Scoto-Britanni, Elementa Medicinæ Physico-Mathematica, libris duobus, quorum prior Theoriam posterior Praxin exhibet' (compiled from notes taken by his pupils). An edition was published at the Hague in 1718, and at Leyden in 1737, and an English translation at London in 1718 and 1727. A collection of all his Latin works, with the addition of a few poems, appeared under the title 'Archibaldi Pitcarnii Opera omnia Medica,'Venice, 1733; Leyden, 1737. An 'Account of the Life and Writings of Dr. Pitcairne,' by Charles Webster, M.D., was published at Edinburgh in 1781.

[Webster's Account of Life and Writings, 1781; Wodrow's Analecta; Lauder of Fountainhall's Historical Notices (Bannatyne Glub); Chalmers's Life of Ruddiman; Tytler's Life of Lord Kames; Cheyne's Essay of Health, 1724, pref. p. ii; Biographia Britannica; Irving's Scottish Writers; Chambers's Eminent Scotsman, T. F. H.

PITCARNE, ALEXANDER (1622)-1695), Scottish presbyterian divine, was son of Alexander Pitcarne, minister of Tannadice, Forfarshire. The family was subjected to much loss and suffering during the civil wars, and the father's petition for redress lay before the Scottish parliament from 1641 to 1661, when it was 'recomendit' to the privy council (Acts of Parl. vols. v. vii.) Alexander entered St. Salvator's College, St. Andrews, in November 1639, matriculated in February 1640 (Univ. Matric. Books), was laureated M.A. in 1643, became regent in February 1648, and so continued till December 1656, when he was ordained minister of Dron, Perthshire. Although he was deprived by acts of parliament and of privy council in 1862, Robert Leighton, bishop of Dunblane, within whose diocese Dron was included, so highly respected his character, learning, and scruples, that Pitcarne was permitted to continue to discharge his ministerial duties (Register of the Diocesan Synod of Dunblane). But after Ramsay had succeeded Leighton as bishop, Pitcarne was charged at a synodical meeting held at Dunblane on 8 Oct. 1678 with having 'begun of late to doe things verie disorderlie,' in admitting people of other parishes to church ordinances. His case was referred to the moderator of his presbytery, who on 8 April 1679 reported that 'Mr. Pitcairne had verie thankfully entertained the connivance and kindness he had met with,' the matter of offence being 'done mostly without his knowledge' (ib.) The imposition of the test in 1681 brought matters to a crisis, and, Pitenrne contents, and preface prefixed in due order being again deprived, the crown appointed a (Bodl.) successor. When the latter endeavoured to enter on the charge, so determined a resistance was offered that the privy council instructed the Marquis of Atholl to quarter facilis Physiologue idea Aristotelice troops on the parish, to hold courts, and fine, imprison, and scourge old and young, men and women, who failed to assist the crown's nominee. Ejected from his parish, Pitcarne sought refuge in Holland, where in 1085 his treatise on 'Justification' (infra) was published. In 1687 he returned to Scotland, and in 1090 was by act of parliament restored to his parish (Wodrow, Hist. iii. 390). At the instance of William of Orange he was appointed provost of St. Salvator's College, St. Andrews, in 1691, and became in 1698 principal of St. Mary's College, a post which he retained till his death (Minutes of Synod of Fife, App. p. 214). For this event various dates have been assigned, but that given on the marble tablet put up to his momory in the vestibule of St. Salvator's Church, viz. 'September, 1695,' is doubtless correct. This is also the date given in the 'Minutes of the Synod of Fife' (App. p. 214). He was about seventy-three years of age, and his office of principal remained vacant until 1697, when Thomas Forrester (1635 P-1706) [q. v.] was appointed his successor.

On 13 March 1645 Pitcarne married Janet Clark of St. Andrews, by whom he had four sons—David, Alexander, George, and James -and a daughter Lucretia. Of the sons. Alexander was ordained minister of Kilmany in 1697, but died early.

Notwithstanding Wodrow's testimony that Principal Pitcarno was a 'worthy and learned minister, known through the reformed churches by his writings' (Workow, Hist. iii. 390), his reputation as an author has been impaired by the erroneous attribution of his Latin works to a supposititious writer of the same name 'who flourished' at the sume period. All his books are controversial in tendency, and aim, in his own words, 'to vindicate orthodoxy and confute ancient and modern error.'

His best known and oarliest work is entitled 'The Spiritual Sacrifice, or a Trontise . . . concerning the Saint's Communion with God in Prayer,' Edinburgh, Robert Brown, 1664, in two vols. 4to, separately issued. The dedication to the Viscountess Stormont is prefixed to vol. ii., and the author experienced great difficulty in getting the volume through the press. In the same year it was issued in London with a new title-page, in 1 vol. 4to, with the dedication, Pitcarne also wrote a philosophical and metaphysical treatise, dedicated to Robert Boylo, and entitled Compendiaria et perunacum Anatome Cartesianismi . . . Authore Alexandro Pitcarnio Scoto, Philosophim quondam professore, nunc Dronensis Ecclesia Strathernia Pastore, 8vo, London, 1876; as well as 'Harmonia Euangelica Apostolorum Pauli et Jacobi in doctrina de Justificatione,' 8vo, Rotterdam, 1685, dedicated to Sir James Dalrymple, first viscount Stair.

[Acts of the Scottish Parliament; Wodrow's History; Scott's Fasti; Fountainhall's Decisions; Register of the Diocesan Synod of Dunblane; Selections from the Minutes of the Synod of Fife: Brunton and Haig's Senators of the Coll. of Justice; St. Andrews University and Parish Regis-

PITMAN, JOHN ROGERS (1782-1861), divine and author, was born in 1782, and educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, He was admitted B.A. in 1804, and pro-cooded M.A. in 1815. Taking holy orders, he was appointed perpetual curate of Berden or Beardon and vicar of Ugley, Essex, 18 Feb. 1817 (FOSTUR, Index Eccl. p. 141). He became well known as a preacher in London, at Berkoley and Belgrave Chapels, and at the Foundling and Magdalene Hospitals before 1830. In 1833 he was presented to the perpetual curacy of St. Barnabas, Kensington, by the vicar, J. II. Pott. He resigned his Essex livings in 1846, and Kensington in 1818, becoming domestic chaplain to the Duchessof Kont. He diedat Bath on 27 Aug. 1861, a few months after his royal patroness (Gent. Mag. 1861, ii. 452).

He was a prolific writer, compiler, and editor, producing annotated editions of the works of Jeremy Taylor (1820-2), Light-foot (1822-5), Reynolds (1826), of Hooke's 'Roman History' (1821), of Patrick's and Lowth's Commentaries (1822), and of Bing-ham's 'Origines Ecclesiastico' (1840). Be-sidos numerous sermons, he also published: 1. 'Excerpta ex variis Romanis poetis,' London, 1808, 8vo. 2. 'Practical Lectures upon the Ten First Chapters of the Gospel of St. John, London, 1821, 8vo; with a supplement, 1822. 3. The School Shakespeare, with notes, London, 1822, 8vo. 4. 'Sophoclis Ajax,' Greek and Latin, with notes, London, 1830, 8vo. 5. 'Practical Commentary on our Lord's Sermon on the Mount,' London, 1852, 8vo.

Luard's Grad. Cantabr. ; Foster's Index Eccl. ;

Clergy List; Gent. Mag. 1861, pt. ii. p. 452.]

(1639 ?-1719), Lord PITMEDDEN, [See SETON, SIR ALEX-Scottish judge.

ANDER.

PITS, ARTHUR (1557-1634?), catholic priest, was younger son of Arthur Pitts, LL.B., sometime fellow of All Souls', Oxford, registrary of the diocese of Oxford, and impropriator of Iffley, who died a man of some wealth on 10 May 1578. The son, born at lifley in 1557, became a chorister of All Souls', and was afterwards for a time at Biasenose College, Oxford. He did not graduate, but with two brothers left for Douay, apparently in 1575, and joined an elder brother, Robert, who was already settled there in deacon's orders. Although his father had left him and his brothers considerable property at Staunton, Woodfrey, Iffley, and Stafford, he was described in the Douay matriculation register as 'pauper.' From Douay he was sent in 1577 to the English seminary at Rome. He was back at Douay in 1579, when he was described as twenty-two years old and student of theology in minor orders, and as having 'declared himself ready to procced to England for the help of souls, and confirmed this by oath. He set out for England on 22 April 1581, in company with Standishe, the two forming part of a detachment of forty-seven priests sent from Dougy during the year (cf. Lansd. MS. 33, No. 16). On 6 Feb. 1582 he was seized, with George Haydock and another priest, while dining together at an inn in London. The three were committed to the Tower. In October Cardinal Allen wrote that Pits was expecting of Westminster kindly furnished by Father Ritorture and death. In January 1581-5 he chard Staunton.] W. A. S. and twenty other priests were banished from England. They were shipped from Tower Wharf, and landed on the coast of Normandy in February, after signing a certificate to the effect that they had been well treated on the voyage (Rishton's addition to Sanders's English Schism ' Troubles,' 2nd edit. p. 69).

According to Dodd (iii. 80), Pits resumed his studies at Rheims, and came out doctor in both faculties-law and divinity. He seems to have graduated D.D. at Douay; but, according to a contemporary narrative (Petyt MS. 58854, f. 228, at the Inner Temple), Pits on his banishment 'came into Lorraine,' and was received into the house of the Cardinal of Vaudemont, 'with whom all his life he was in great favour and credit.' A charge of disaffection to the king of France, brought against him by a jesuit, led to his imprisonment. The charge apparently arose from Pits's patriotic insistence, in opposition to the josnits, on the desirability of converting

England to catholicism through the agency of martyrs rather than by the army of a continental power.

On 27 April 1602 Pits, according to an informer, was in England. According to Wood, he came back 'at length for health's sake, leaving the preferments abroad. When, in 1623, the pope re-established the catholic hierarchy in England, and William Bishop [q. v.] was nominated vicar-apostolic and bishop of Chalcedon, Pits was appointed one of the first canons of the English chapter, and he became titular archdeacon of London, Westminster, and the suburbs. In later life he resided with the Stonors of Blount's Court in Oxfordshire, and, dying there about 1634. was buried in the church of Rotherfield Peppard.

Pits wrote 'In quatuor Jesu Christi Evangelia et Acta Apostolorum Commentarius, Douay, 1636, 4to, published posthumously by the English Benedictines at Douay.

[Cal. State Papers, Dom.; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ii. 585; Foster's Alumni Ozon.; Marshall's Account of the Townof Iffley, pp. 60-8, 151; Clark's Oxf. Registers; Ingram's Memorials of Oxford, p. 16; Hist. MSS. Comm. 11th Rep. pp. vii, 298, 5th Rep. pp. 472-3; Gillow's Haydock Papers, p. 27; Law's Hist. Sketch of Conflict between Jesuits and Seculars, p. lxxvii; Pollen's Acts of English Martyrs, p. 280; Foley's Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus; Chal-loner's Memoirs of the Missionary Priests; Knox's Letters and Memorials of William, Cardinal Allen; Douny Diaries; information from the Rev. Horatio Walmisley, rector of Iffley; Holinshed's Chronicles, iii. 1379-80; Dodd's Church Hist. iii. 155-8; documents from the archives of the see PITS or PITSEUS, JOHN, D.D. (1560-1616), catholic divine and biographer, son of Henry Pits, by Elizabeth, his wife, sister of Dr. Nicholas Sanders [q. v.], was born at Alton, Hampshire, in 1560, and was ad-mitted to Winchester College in 1571 (KIRRY, Winchester Scholars, p. 144). He became a probationer-fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1578, and would have been admitted a perpetual fellow of that house in 1580 had he not, for conscience' sake, left the university and gone 'beyond the seas as a voluntary exile.' At Donay he was kindly received by Thomas Stapleton. Thence he went to Rheims, where the English College of Douay was then temporarily settled, arriving on 12 Aug. 1581 (Records of the English Catholics, i. 180). After staying a fortnight he proceeded to Rome, was admitted into the English College in that city on 18 Oct. 1581, and took the college oath on 15 April 1582.

He studied philosophy and divinity at Rome for six years, and was ordained priest (Foldy, Records, vi. 149). Returning to Rhoims (8 April 1587), he taught rhetoric and Greek there for two years. In consequence of the civil troubles in France, he then withdrew to Lorraine, having been appointed tutor to a nobleman's son, and he took the degrees of master of arts and bachelor of divinity at Pont-à-Mousson. Subsequently he resided for a year and a half at Trèves, where he was made a licentiate of divinity. After visiting several of the principal cities of Germany, he settled for three years at Ingolstadt in Bavaria, and was created a doctor of divinity in that university. On his return to Lorraine he was appointed by Charles, cardinal of Lorraine, to a canonry in the cathedral church of Verdun. At the expiration of two years he was summoned from Verdun by Antonia, daughter of the Duke of Lorraine and wife of the Duke of Cleves, and appointed her confessor. Wood says that in order to 'be the better serviceable to her, he learned the French tongue most accurately; so that it was usual with him afterwards to preach in that language.' After continuing about twolve years in the service of the princess, he went, on her death, for the third time into Lorraine, and was promoted by his former pupil, Jean Porcelot, bishop of Toul, to the deanery of Liverdun, which, with a canonry and an officialship of the same church, yielded a He died at Liverdun on large income. 17 Oct. (O.S.) 1616, and was buried in the collegiate church, where a monument with a Latin inscription, copied by Wood, was crected to his memory.

His principal work is: 1. 'Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis Tom. I. quatuor Partes complectons, Paris, 1619, 4to. No other volume was published. It is commonly referred to as 'De illustribus Anglia Scriptoribus,' that being the running title of the second or principal part of the work, which was edited, with a preface, by William Bishop [q.v.], bishop of Chalcedon. The first part consists of certain prolegomena (a) De Laudibus Historia, (b) De Antiquitate Ecclesia Britannia, (c) De Academiis, tam antiquis Britonum, quam recentioribus Anglorum. The third part contains an 'Appendivillustrium Scriptorum, and the fourth fifteen indices. Most of the lives of English writers are taken from 'Do Scriptoribus Majoris Britannim' by John Bale [q.v.], hishop of Ossory, although Pits declares an abhorrence of Bale and his writings, omits Wich and all the Wicliste writers whom Bale commemorates, and shows throughout a strong catholic bias. Almost the only original, and by far the most valuable, biographies in Pits's compilation are those of the catholic writers after the period of the Reformation, most of whom withdrew to the continent after the accession of Elizabeth. Among them, however, he includes, probably from lack of full information, 'some that were sincere protestants, or at least more protestants than papiets,' such as Sir Anthony Cope, Thomas Caius, master of University College, John Caius, John Leland, Robert Record, and Timothy Bright.

Pits's other works are: 2. 'De Legibus, Tractatus Theologicus, Trèves, 1592. 3. 'De Beatitudine, Tractatus Theologicus,' Ingolstadt, 1595. 4. 'De Peregrinatione libri septem. Jam primum in lucem editi,' Dusseldorf, 1601, 12mo; dedicated to the Princess Antonia, duchess of Cleves.

In Wood's time there were preserved among the archives of the church of Liverdun three manuscript treatises by Pits, respectively entitled 'De Regibus Anglie;' 'De Episcopis Anglie,' chiefly taken from Godwin's 'Bishops of England' (1601); and 'De Viris Apostolicis Anglies.'

[Addit. MS. 5878, f. 73; Biogr. Brit.; Dodd's Church Hist. ii. 374; Douay Diaries, p. 436; Foley's Records, iii. 646-8, vi. 149; Foster's Alumni Oxon. early ser. iii. 1170; Ghilini's Teatro d'Huemini Letterati, 1647, ii. 134; Kirby's Annals of Winchester College, p. 289; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. iv. 386, 6th ser. vii. 226, viii. 464; Oxford Univ. Reg. vol. ii. pt, ii. p. 85; Pits, De Angliæ Scriptoribus, p. 817, Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, ii. 172.]

PITSOOTTIE, ROBERT OF (1500?-1505?), Scottish historian. [See LINDBAX.]

PITSLIGO, fourth and last Baron Forbes of. [See Forbus, Alexander, 1678-1762.]

PITT, ANN (1720?-1799), actress, was born in London in 1720 or 1721. After some practice in the country, she appeared as Miss Pitt at Drury Lane, under Garrick, playing on 13 Sept. 1748 the Nurse in the 'Relapse. Hor name appears during the season of 1748-1749 to Lady Lovernic in the Devil to Pay Dame Pliant in the 'Alchemist' to Garrick's Abel Drugger, Lucy in the 'London Merchant,' and Beatrice in the 'Anatomist,' with an original part unnamed in the 'Hen Peck'd Captain,'a farce taken by Richard Cross from D' Urfoy's 'Campaigners.' Next season saw her as Dorcas in the 'Mock Doctor,' Nurse in 'Love for Love,' Lady Darling in the 'Constant Couple, Mrs. Peachum in the 'Beggars' Opera,' Lettice in 'Friendship in Fashion,' and the following season as Fool in the 'Pilgrim.' On 2 Feb. 1751 she was the , original Bernarda in Moore's 'Gil Blas,' and on 16 March she played an original part (unnamed) in 'A Lick at the Town,' an unprinted play by Woodward. On 28 Jan. 1752 she first appeared at Covent Garden, with which theatre she was associated during the remainder of her career. She played Jucinta in the 'Falso Friend.' There followed Lucy in the 'Lover his own Rival,' Lady Manlove in the 'Schoolboy,' Mrs. Day in the 'Committee,' and Lady Wishfor't in the 'Way of the World.' On 3 Oct. 1755, as Lappet in the 'Miser,' she was first advertised as Mrs. Pitt. Among the characters in which she was most famous must be mentioned that of the Nurse in 'Romeo and Juliet,' the 'Relapse,' the 'Man of Quality,' Love for Love,' and 'Isabelia, or the Fatal Marriage;' the hostess in 'King Henry V,' Mrs. Quickly in the 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' Patch in the 'Busy Body,' Mrs. Croaker (her original character) in the 'Good-natured Man, Mrs. Hardcastle. She is said during her long lifetime to have played the Nurse to the following Juliets: Mrs. Cibber, Mrs. Bellamy, Miss Nossiter, Miss Hallam (Mrs. Mattocks), Miss Satchell (Mrs. S. Kemble), and Miss Young (Mrs. Pope). In a feeble and spiteful notice in his 'Children of Thespis,' Anthony Pasquin (John Williams) says:

Her Quickly, her Dorcas, old spinsters, and

Are parts, when she dies, should be laid in her hearse.

Among other parts assigned her were Flora in the 'Wonder,' Audrey in 'As you like it,' Lady Pride in the 'Amorous Widow,' Mrs. Prim in ' A Bold Stroke for a Wife, Lady Wronghead in the 'Provoked Husband,'Cob's Wife in 'Every Man in his Humour,' Lady Woodville in 'Man of the Mode,' Kitty Pry in the 'Lying Valet,' Viletta in 'She would and she would not,' Aunt in the 'Tender Husband' and in 'Sir Courtly Nice,' Lucy in the 'Old Bachelor,' Tattleaid in the 'Funeral,' Abigail in the 'Drummer,' Mrs. Honeycombe, Lucy in the 'Recruiting Officer,' Ruth in the 'Squire of Alsatia,' Deborah Woodcock, Florella in the 'Orphan,' Mrs. Midnight in 'Twin Rivals,' and in 'Country Madcap,' Second Witch in 'Macbeth,' Lady Rusport, the Duenna in the 'Duenna,' Landlady in the 'Chances,' Old Woman in 'Rule a Wife and have a Wife,' and Dorcas in 'Cymon.' Among her few original parts were Pert in 1776. Macklin's Married Libertine' (28 Jan. 1781), Mrs. Pitt's daughter, Harring Putt (d. Mrs. Drugget in Murphy's 'What we all 1811), was a dancer at Covent Garden in (31 Jan. 1765), Catty Farrell in Macklin's 'Irish Fine Lady' ['The True-born Irishman'] (28 Nov. 1767, at which time her salary was 3t. a week), Mrs. Croaker in the 'Good-natured Man' (29 Jan. 1768), Mrs. Carlton in Calmar', (No. 1768), 1768, 1761, 176 ton in Colman's 'Man of Business' (31 Jan. 1774), Bridget in Sheridan's 'St. Patrick's Day, or the Scheming Lieutenant' (2 May 1775), the Marchioness in Dibdin's Shepherdess of the Alps' (18 Jan. 1780), Mrs. Trip in Holcroft's 'Duplicity' (13 Oct. 1781), Mrs. Partlett in Cumberland's 'Walloons' (190 April 1789) and Balaira in Partlett. (20 April 1782), and Rodriguez in Barataria, by Pilon (29 March 1785). This seems to have been her last original part. On 2 June 1792 she played the Spanish Lady in 'Barataria,' after which she left the stage. In the 'Reminiscences' of her grandson, Thomas Dibdin, it is stated that Mrs. Pitt, at the age of seventy-two, as Dorcas in Garrick's 'Cymon,' was encored in the song 'I tremble at seventy-two' (i. 11). She died on 18 Dec. 1799. She was buried in the cemetery attached to St. James's Chapel, Pentonville, in the family grave of Charles Dibdin the younger. A stone still standing gives her age as seventy-eight years.

'Sir' John Hill, in the second part of the 'Actor,' praises Miss Pit [sic] for an 'important pertness in manner and a volubility of tongue' (p. 221). The author of the 'Theatrical Review, 1757-8, says: 'I look upon her as the best woman comedian in Covent Garden. She has been for some years the only actress who has exhibited the superannuated coquettes, and her performance of them has been such as left the spectator no room to wish a better (p. 40). After speaking of a dangerous coming rival in Mrs. Clive, he adds that the province in question requires most genuine humour: that is the reason why Mrs. Pitt excels in them, [she] being possessed in an eminent degree of that essential qualification. She has also a great deal of pertness, which, in the chambermaids, is very agreeable and necessary.' In the curious scale of actors which accompanies the volume he puts her as 18 in genius, 12 in judgment and in ris comica, and 13 in variety. Garrick's figures in the same respects, it may be said, are 18, 16, 18, 18, and Mrs. Clive's 17, 16, 17,

A portrait, attributed to Hogarth (P), is in the Mathews collection in the Garrick A small engraved portrait of her as Lady Wishfor't was published on 26 Oct.

must come to' (9 Jan. 1761), Lady Syca- January 1762, and appeared as one of the more in Dickerstall's 'Maid of the Mill', three graces in the 'Arcadian Nuptials' on on 10 Oct. and 14 Dec. 1705. She remained at Covent Garden until the end of the season of 1767-8, dancing at Charles Dibdin's benefit on 24 May 1768. She became, by Charles Dibdin the song-writer, the mother of Thomas John Dibdin [q. v.], and, after sepa-rating from Dibdin about 1775, she appeared at Drury Lane. Later, about 1783, she returned to Covent Cardon, where she took the name of Mrs. Davenet to distinguish her from her mother, and was described by Pasquin in 1788 as an 'old tabby.' She died on 10 Dec. 1814, and was buried in the same grave as her mother (information supplied by E. R. Dibdin, esq.)

[Books cited; Genest's Account of the English Stage; Thespian Dictionary; Gent. Mag. 1800, pt. i. p. 84; Kelly's Thespis; Pasquin's Children of Thespis; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. viii. 47, PITT, CHRISTOPHER (1699-1748), poet and translator, was born at Blandford, Dorset, in 1699. His father, Christopher, the descendant of a well-to-do Dorset family, was a physician of good standing, who practised in Blandford, and died there in 1723. He contributed the 'Plague of Athens' to the well-known translation of Lucretius by Thomas Oreech [q.v.], a work dedicated to his kinsman, George Pitt of Strathfieldsaye, father of George Pitt, first baron Rivers [q. v.] The poet's elder brother, Robert Pitt, was elected a fellow of Wadham in 1719, and displayed scholarly taste in a translation into Latin of five books of Milton's 'Paradise Lost.' Robert Pitt [q. v.], the physician and fellow of the Royal Society, was probably a great-uncle, and Governor Thomas Pitt (1653-1726) [q. v.] was the poet's first cousin.

Christopher was admitted a scholar at Winchester in 1713. He matriculated from Wadham College on 5 April 1718, but in the following March was elected scholar of Now College, and presented the electors with an English metrical version of Lucan. This was never printed, in consequence of the appearance of Rowe's translation in the same year. While still an undergraduate, however, he published a 'Pocm on the Death of the late Earl of Stanhope. Humbly inscribed to the Countess of Stanhope,' London, 1721, 8vo. Lady Stanhope (daughter of Governor Pitt) was his second cousin. He was elected a fellow of New College on 5 March 1721, and graduated B.A. on 10 Oct. 1722. A few days later he was presented by George Pitt to the rectory of Pimperne in Dorset. He continued in residence at Oxford until he cold and listless perusal; Pitt pleases the 20 Jan. 1761, and as Flora in the 'Wonder' obtained the degree of M.A. in 1724, but spent the remainder of his life at Pimperne in single contentment and seclusion. Combining an enthusiasm for literature with a modest estimate of his own powers, he devoted his best energies to translations. In 1725 he published a verse translation of the 'De Arte Poetica' of Marcus Hieronymus Vida, bishop of Alba, first published at Paris in 1534. This work had long been popular abroad, but had only recently been rendered familiar to English readers in the sumptuous edition of T. Tristram (Oxford, 1723, 12mo). Pitt's translation saw a second edition in 1712. About 1726 he sent to Pope a translation of the twenty-third book of the 'Odyssey,' which the poet acknowledged in flattering terms and used extensively in correcting the labours of his journeyman, William Broome [q. v.] In the following year he dedicated to George Pitt, under the title 'Pooms and Translations,' some juvenile poems, together with metrical versions of psalms. It was in 1728 that he first turned his attention to a translation of Virgil's 'Afneid,' for which his facility in smooth and graceful versification specially fitted him. In that year he issued an 'Essay on Virgil's Adneid, being a Translation of the first Book, London, 8vo, which elicited warm praise from Dr. Young, Bishop Secker, Spence, Broome, Duncombe, and other patrons and friends. In March 1732 Spence, then travelling in Italy, wrote him a highly complimentary letter from the Tomb of Virgil.' Thus encouraged, he completed, on 2 June 1738, a translation of the whole poem into heroic couplets, which was dedicated to Frederick, prince of Wales, and published in two handsome quarto volumes, London, 1740. Pitt carefully read all the versions of his predecessors, and describes the fatigue experienced during the perusal of the translation by John Ogilby [q. v.] llo disarmed any very scathing comment on his hardihood in following in Dryden's footsteps by the remark in his proface that 'a Painter of a lower Rank may draw a Face that was taken by Titian and think of mending his Hand by it, without any thought of equalling his master.' Pitt's translation was included, with high commendation, in Warton's edition of Virgil (4 vols. 8vo, 1753); but the prevailing opinion of contemporaries, that it rivalled the work of Dryden in beauty while it surpassed it in accuracy, has not been confirmed by subsequent critics. Dr. Johnson remarked that Dryden's faults are forgotten in the hurry of delight, and Pitt's beauties are neglected in the languor of a critics, and Dryden the people; Pitt is quoted, and Dryden read.' After the lapse of a century, Professor Comington remarks: 'Besides Dryden's, Pitt's is the only version which can be said to be at present in existence: a dubious privilege which it owes to the fact of its having been included in the successive collections of English poetry, of which John-60n's was the first."

Like more distinguished members of his family, Pitt suffered from an early age from a very severe form of gout, which undermined his constitution. He died at Pimperne on 15 April 1748, and was buried in Blandford church, where a mural inscription celebrates 'his candour and primitive simplicity of manners,' and states that 'he lived innocent and died beloved.' A portrait engraved by Cook is prefixed to the selection of his verses given in Bell's 'Poets' (1782, vol. xcix.) Selections, prefixed by memoirs, are also given in Anderson's 'Poets' (viii. 796), Chalmers's 'Poets' (vols. xii. xix.), Park's 'British Poets' (vol. iii.), and Sanford's 'British Poets' (vol. xxi.) Several letters from Pitt to Duncombe are printed in the correspondence of John Hughes.

[Hutchine's Dorset, i. 286; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Kirby's Winchester Scholars; Gardiner's Register of Wadham; Cibber's Lives of the Poets, v. 298; Nichola's Lit. Anecd. ii. 260; Johnson's Poets, ed. Cunningham, iii. 219; Chalmors's Biogr. Dict. xxiv. 593; Gent. Mag. 1813, 1. 537; Pope's Works, ed. Elwin and Courthope, passim; Julian's Dict. of Hymnology; Brit. Mus. Cat.]

PITT, GEORGE, first BARON RIVERS (1722?-1803), eldest son of George Pitt of Stratfieldsaye, Hampshire, by his wife Mary Louisa, daughter of John Bernier, matriculated on 26 Sept. 1737 from Magdalen College, Oxford; he graduated M.A. on 13 March 1739, and D.C.L. on 21 Aug. 1745. At a by-election in June 1742 Pitt was returned to the House of Commons for Shaftesbury, and in December of that year voted against the payment of the Hanovorian troops (Parl. Hist. xii. At the general election in the summer of 1747 ho was returned both for Shaftesbury and for Dorset. He elected to sit for the county, and continued to represent Dorset until the dissolution in September 1774. He was appointed colonel of the Dorset militia on its establishment in 1757, and from 1701 to 1708 he served as envoy-extraordinary and minister-plenipotentiary to Turin. On 19 Feb. 1770 he was appointed ambassador-extraordinary and minister-plenipo-tentiary to Madrid, but was succeeded in that post by Lord Grantham in January 1771. He was created Baron Rivers of Stratfieldsaye in the county of Southampton on 20 May 1776, and took his seat in the House of Lords on the following day (Journals of the House of Lords, xxxiv. 741). In May 1780 he was appointed lord lieutenant of Hampshire, but only held that post until 1782, when he became one of the lords of the bedchamber. In October 1793 he was appointed lord lieutenant of Dorset, and on 16 March 1802 he was created Baron Rivers of Sudeley Castle in the county of Gloucester, with remainder, in default of male issue, to his brother Sir William Augustus Pitt, K.B. (see below), with a subsequent remainder to the male issue of Lord Rivers's second daughter, Louisa. He died on 7 May 1802, and was buried in the family vault at Stratfieldsaye; there is a mural tablet by Flaxman to his memory in the church.

He married, on 4 Jan. 1746, Penelope, daughter of Sir Henry Atkins, bart., of Clapham, Surrey, by whom he had an only son-George, born at Angers in France on 8 Sept. 1751, whose estate of Stratfieldsaye was purchased in 1814 for the Duke of Wellington, under the provisions of 54 George III, c. 161, and who died, unmarried, on 20 July 1828, when the barony of Rivers of Stratfieldsaye became extinct-and three daughters, viz.: (1) Penelope, who married, first, in 1766, Lieutenant-colonel Edward Ligonier (afterwards Earl Ligonier) [see under LIGONIER, JOHN, from whom she was divorced by a decree of the London consistory court on 10 Dec. 1771, the marriage being dissolved by a private act of parliament in the following year (12 Geo. III, c. 48), and, secondly, on 4 May 1784, a trooper in the blues; (2) Louisa, who married, on 22 March 1773, Peter Beckford of Steepleton Iwerne, Dorset, and died at Florence on 80 April 1791, leaving an only son, Horace William, who became third Baron Rivers of Sudeley Castle upon the death of his uncle George in 1828; and (3) Marcia Lucy, who married, on 4 Aug. 1789, James Fox-Lane of Bramham Park, Yorkshire, and died on 5 Aug. 1822. Lady Rivers died at Milan on 8 Feb. 1795.

Rivers was a very handsome man, and when young was a great favourite with Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (WALPOLE, Letters, 1857, i. 179, ii, 167). Walpole, who celebrated the charms of Lady Rivers in 'The Beauties, an Epistle to Mr. Eckardt the painter' (Onford, Works, 1798, i. 28), never tires of praising 'his lovely wife, all loveliness within and without' (WALFOLE, Letters, iii. 460), while he describes Rivers as 'her brutal, half-mad husband' (ib. v. 422). A full-length portrait of Rivers in uniform, painted turn of List of Members of Parliament, pt. ii. by Gainsborough in 1769, was lent to the winter exhibition at Burlington House in 1881 (Catalogue, No. 20). There are mezzotints of Lady Rivers by O. Corbutt after Miss Read, and by R. Houston after Miss Carwardine. There is no record of any speech made by Rivers either in the House of Commons or in the House of Lords.

He published: 1. 'Letters to a Young Nobleman, upon various subjects, particularly on Government and Civil Liberty ... with some Thoughts on the English Constitution, and the Heads of a Plan of a Parliamentary Reform, London, 1784, 8vo, anon. 2. An Authentic Account of a late Negotiation, for the purpose of obtaining the Disfranchisement of Cranbourne Chace, with an Appendix' [London], 1791, 4to, anon. 3. 'The Present State of the Dorsetshire Militia, set forth in a Series of Letters between the Colonel and some of the Principal Officers of that Regiment, from September 1793 to this Time,' London, 1797, 4to, anon.
The brother, Sir William Augustus

PITT (1728-1809), general, fourth son of the family, was appointed cornet in the 10th dragoons on 1 Feb. 1744, and served in the seven years' war (1756-63). He distinguished himself in several actions, and was wounded and taken prisoner at Campen. Becoming colonel in 1762, and major-general in 1770, he was promoted to be colonel of the 12th dragoons in October 1770, and five years later was transferred to the 3rd Irish horse, now the 6th dragoon guards or carabineers. He became lieutenant-general in 1777, and genoral in 1793, was from 1784 to 1791 commander of the forces in Iroland, and was governor of Portsmouth from 1794 till his death, and colonel of the 1st dragoon guards from July 1796. He was created a knight of the Bath in 1792. He predeceased Lord Rivers, dying at Highfield Park, Hampshire, on 29 Dec. 1809, and leaving no issue. He married Mary, daughter of Scroope, viscount Howe, of the kingdom of Ireland (CANNON, Historical Records of the First or King's Drayoon Guards, 1887: Gent. Mag. 1810, pt. i. p. 92).

[Hutchins's History of Dorset, 2nd edit. iii. 360 et passim; Chatham Correspondence, 1838, ii. 163-4; Gent. Mag. 1746 pp. 44-5, 1751 p. 127, 1771 pp. 566-7, 1778 p. 154, 1789 pt. ii. p. 762, 1784 pt. i. p. 395, 1791 pt. i. p. 400, 1795 pt. i. p. 255, 1822 pt. ii. p. 186, 1828 pt. ii. pp. 463-5; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886, iii. 1120; Edmonson's Baronagium Geneal. 1784, suppl. vol. pp. 70-1; Burko's Extinct Peorage, 1883, p. 616; Collins's Peerage, 1812, vii. 400-2; Hayda's Book of Dignities, 1890; Official Repp. 87, 100, 111, 126, 139; Brit. Mus. Cat.

PITT, JOHN, second Earl of CHATHAM (1756-1835), general, born on 10 Sept. 1756, was eldest son of the statesman, William Pitt, first earl of Chatham [q. v.], whom he succeeded in 1778. His mother was Hester Grenville, only daughter of Richard Grenville and sister of Earl Temple. The younger William Pitt, the statesman, was his younger brother. Entering the army as a lad in 1774. he left in 1776. Re-entering it in 1778, he was appointed lieutenant in the 39th foot, and served as a subaltern during the siege of Gib. raltar in 1779-83. In 1779 he was promoted captain in the 86th or Rutland regiment, which was disbanded at the close of the American war,

In July 1788 his younger brother, then prime minister, invited him to join his ministry, and he entered the cabinet on 16 July as first lord of the admiralty. He held the office until December 1794. He was admitted to the privy council on 3 April 1789, and was created K.G. on 15 Dec. 1700. On retiring from the admiralty, to make way for Lord Spencer, on 20 Dec. 1794, Chatham retained his seat in the cabinet, being appointed lord privy seal, and on 21 Sept. 1796 he was transferred to the presidency of the council. He resigned with his brother in July 1801.

Meanwhile he maintained his connection with the army. He was promoted colonel in 1793, major-general in 1795, and colonel of the 4th (king's own) regiment of foot in 1799. In the last year he commanded a brigade in Holland under the Duke of York; he was present on 2 Oct. 1799 at the battle of Borgon, and successfully relieved General Coote when that officer was warmly engaged and hard pressed by the French. Again, on 6 Oct. he was present at the severe though indocisive affair at Boverwyk, where he was wounded. After his return home he was appointed to the responsible office of mastergeneral of the ordnance (27 June 1801), and held it for five years, until 8 Feb. 1806. He became lieutenant-general in 1802, governor of Plymouth on 80 March 1805, and governor of Jersey on 22 Sept. 1807.

Although extraordinarily distant in mannor, he was a favourite of George III, to whose favour he mainly owed his numerous employments. But he was ambitious of military distinction, and was keenly disappointed by the bestowal of the command of the army in the Peninsula on Wellesley in 1808. It is said that, to soothe his wounded feelings, he was directed to take charge in 1809 of the expedition to Walcheren, with which his name was to be chiefly connected. The object of the expedition was to destroy Napoleon's fleet and arsenals on the Scheldt, after the troops that usually protected them had been withdrawn in order to take part in the Austrian campaign. Flushing was to be reduced, and Antwerp captured. The force under his command was nearly forty thousand strong, while Sir Richard Strachan [q.v.], with thirtyfive ships of the line and numerous smaller vessels, was ordered to co-operate with the land forces. Chatham proved himself wholly unequal to the task assigned him. On 29 July part of his army landed at Walcheren and siezed Middleburg, while other divisions captured fortresses about the mouth of the Scheldt. Antwerp, which could easily have been occupied, was neglected in order that Flushing might be besieged. Flushing surrendered on 16 Aug., but meanwhile Antwerp had been strongly fortified, and its garrison reinforced. In September Chatham suspended operations, ordered fifteen thousand troops to Walcheren, and accompanied the others home. The climate of Walcheren told on the soldiers, and half the army there was soon invalided. Orders were thereupon sent from London to destroy Flushing and abandon Walcheren.

Chatham's failure was complete, and provoked a storm of recrimination in parliament. For many of the disasters the differences of opinion in the cabinet, between Castlercagh, the war minister, and Canning, the foreign minister, were responsible. But the thoroughness of the disaster was due to Chatham's lack of energy and military ability. On returning home he, contrary to etiquette, presented a partisan report to the king in private audience, instead of forwarding it to Castlereagh, the secretary of state. An inquiry into his conduct was held, and the revelations deeply compromised his reputation. He attributed fatal delays in his early movements to the dilatoriness of the admiral, Strachan. The situation gave rise to the epigram-

Great Chatham, with his sabre drawn, Stood waiting for Sir Richard Strachan; Sir Richard, longing to be at 'em, Stood waiting for the Earl of Chatham!

Strachan's friends retaliated with a charge of unpunctuality against Chatham, and applied to him the sobriquet 'the late' Earl of Chatham.

Nothwithstanding his condemnation, Chatham received further promotion. He was promoted general in the army on 1 Jan. 1812, and on the death of the Duke of Kent, in 1820, he was made governor of Gibraltar.

That post he held till his death. He died in London, at 10 Charles Street, Berkeley Square, on 24 Sept. 1835.

Chatham strongly resembled his father 'in face and person,' and in nothing else. His manners were said by Wraxall 'to forbid approach' and 'prohibit all familiarity' (WRAXALL, Memoirs, iii. 129). He married, in 1788, Mary Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas, first viscount Sydney. She died in 1821, without issue.

[Doyle's Official Baronage; Debrett's Peerage, 1834; Alison's Hist. of Europe, vi. 251 n., vii. 456 n., ix. 236, 238, 239, 240, 241, 246; Observations on the Documents laid before Parliament &c. on the late expedition to the Scheldt, London, 1810; Royal Military Calendar, 3rd edit. i. 375, London, 1820; Cust's Annals of the Wars, v. 222-31; Cannon's Historical Records of the British Army: History of 4th or King's Own Regiment of Foot.]

PITT, MOSES (A. 1654-1696), publisher and author, the son of John Pitt, yeoman, of St. Teath, Cornwall, was bound apprentice to Robert Littlebury, citizen and haberdasher of London, for seven years from 1 Oct. 1654, and was made freeman of the Haberdashers' Company on 8 Nov. 1661. He became a publisher, and in 1668 issued 'at the White-Hart in Little Britain'an edition of Thomas Brancker's 'Introduction to Algebra.' In 1680 appeared the first volume of the magnificent publication for which Pitt is chiefly known, 'The English Atlas,' a work formerly held in great estimation. Bishop William Nicolson [q.v.] and Richard Peers [q.v.] were generally responsible for the geographical and historical descriptions, and their names appear on some of the title-pages, but Thomas Lane, Obadiah Walker, and Dr. Todd had compiled the first volume (Wood, Athenæ, ed. Bliss, iv. 291, 480, 584; Letters to R. Thoresby, i. 122); the maps are mainly based on Janssen's 'Atlas.' It was to extend to eleven volumes, but only four volumes, and the text of a fifth, large folio, appeared, with the imprint 'Oxford, printed at the Theater for Moses Pitt at the Angel in St. Paul's Churchyard,' 1680-2. The names of Christopher Wren, Isaac Vossius, John Pell, William Lloyd, Thomas Gale, and Robert Hook are mentioned in the prospectus as having promised their advice and assistance. Pitt secured the patronage of Charles II, the queen, and the Duke and Duchess of York, and a long list of subscribers is given in the first volume. He claims to have had printed for him many bibles and testaments at Oxford, and to have reduced prices more than one-half (see Cry of the Oppressed, passim, and note to Wood's Life, ed. Clark, ii. 170).

In spite of the encouragement of Dr. Fell, the 'English Atlas' was not successful from a pecuniary point of view, and Pitt also had losses in building speculations. On 18 April 1685 he was arrested at Obadiah Walker's lodgings at Oxford on a suit for 1,000% (Woon, op. cit. iii. 138), and was imprisoned in the Fleet from 20 April 1689 to 16 May 1691. He described his troubles in a very interesting little volume, 'The Cry of the Oppressed, being a true and tragical account of the unparallel'd sufferings of multitudes of poor imprisoned debtors in most of the gaols of England, together with the case of the publisher, London, 1691, 12mo. This contains a remarkable account of the actual condition of prisoners for debt, not in London alone, but in many other towns, as Pitt conducted a large correspondence with follow sufferers throughout the country. He endeavoured to got a bill passed through parliament for their relief. The book is illustrated with twelve cuts describing the cruelties of gaolors in a startling chapbook style of art. It is full of personal details, and is useful for the topographical history of Westminster, where Pitt built besides other houses, one which he let to Jeffreys, in what is now Delahay Street.

·Pitt also wrote 'A Letter to [Rev. George Hickes the authour of a book intituled some Discourses upon Dr. Burnet and Dr. Tillotson, occasioned by the late funeral sermon of the former upon the latter,' London, 1695. 4to, with more particulars about his money troubles; and An Account of one Ann Jefferies now living in the county of Cornwall, who was fed for six months by a small sort of airy people called fairies, and of the strange and wonderful cures she performed,' London, 1696, small 8vo. Of the latter work there are two editions which vary slightly; the book is reprinted in Morgan's 'Phonix Britannicus,' 1732, 4to, pp. 515-51, and in C. S. Gilbert's 'Cornwall,' i. 107-14. At the time of his death, which took place between 1696 and 1700, he had almost completed a catalogue of English writers.

Pitt married a Miss Upman. He is described by John Dunton as 'an honest man every inch and thought of him, and . . . had fathomed the vast body of learning. . . His wit and virtues were writ legibly in his face, and he had a great deal of sweetness in his natural temper' (Life and Errors, 1818, i. 233-4). Anthony Wood was indebted to him for small items of information (Life, vols. ii. and iii. passim; and Fasti, ed. Bliss, ii. 27).

[Boaso and Courtney's Bibliotheea Cornubiensis, i. 271, iii, 1314; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. iv. 142, v. 105.]

PITT, ROBERT, M.D. (1658-1713), physician, son of Robert Pitt, was born at Blandford Forum, Dorset, in 1658. He matriculated at Wadham College, Oxford, on 2 April 1669, and was elected to a scholarship there in 1670. He graduated B.A. in 1672, was elected a fellow of his college in 1674, graduated M.A. in 1675, M.B. in 1678, and M.D. on 16 Feb. 1682. He taught anatomy at Oxford, and was elected F.R.S. on 20 Dec. 1682. In 1684 he settled in London, and was admitted a candidate or member of the College of Physicians on 22 Dec. He was created a fellow by the new charter of James II, and admitted on 12 April 1687. He was a censor in 1687 and 1702. He lived in 1685 in the parish of St. Peter-le-Poer, in the city of London; in 1703, and till his death, in Hatton Garden. On the death of Francis Bernard [q.v.] he was, on 28 Feb. 1697-8, elected physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and held office till 1707. He took an active part in the controversy which followed the establishment of a dispensary by the College of Physicians in 1096, and published in 1702 'The Craft and Frauds of Physick exposed,' dedicated to Sir William Prichard, president, and to the governors of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and written to show the small cost of the really useful drugs, the worthlessness of some expensive ones, and the folly of taking too much physic. The book gives a clear exposition of the therapeutics of that day, and is full of shrowd observations. Sarsaparilla, which for more than a hundred years later was a highly estcomed drug, had been detected by Pitt to be inert, and he condemned the use of bezoar, of powder of vipers, of mummy, and of many other once famous therapeutic agents, on the ground that accurate tests proved them of no effect. A second and third edition appeared in 1703. In 1704 he published 'The Antidote, or the Preservative of Life and Health and the Restorative of Physick to its Sincerity and Perfection,' and in 1705 'The Frauds and Villainies of the Common Practice of Physic demonstrated to be curable by the College Dispensary.' He was attacked by Joseph Browne (1. 1706) [q.v.] in 1704 in a book entitled 'The Modern Practice of Physick vindicated from the groundless imputations of Dr. Pitt.' He also published a paper in the 'Philosophical Transactions' for 1691 on the weight of the land tortoise. The observations which were made in conjunction with Sir George Ent, M.D. [q. v.], compare the weight of the reptile before and after hibernation for a series of years.

Pitt married Martha, daughter of John

Nourse of Wood Eaton, Oxfordshire, in 1086, and died on 13 Jan. 1712-3.

[Works; Munk's College of Physicians, i. 415; manuscript minute-books of St. Bartholomew's Hospital; Foster's Alumni Oxon.]

PITT, THOMAS (1653-1726), East India merchant and governor at Madras, often called 'Diamond Pitt,' born at Blandford, Dorset, on 5 July 1653, was second son of John Pitt, rector of Blandford St. Mary, and of Sarah, daughter of John Jay. In youth he appears to have been at sea, and he is re-peatedly styled 'captain' in his earlier days; even before he was twenty-one he engaged in the East India trade as an interloper, i.e. as a merchant not authorised to trade by the East India Company.

In 1674 Pitt settled at Balasore, and began a long struggle with the company. On 24 Feb. 1675 the court sent directions that he should be seized: 'wee do require you to take care to send them [Pitt and his party] to the fort, to remain there till next yeares shipping, and then to be sent to England.' When this order reached India (in June 1676), Pitt seems to have left India on a trading expedition in Persia. On 19 Dec. 1670 the court again repeated their orders for his arrest, and Pitt is said to have been brought before the Madras council, and to have promised compliance with the company's orders; but he made no change in his methods of business. He paid further visits to Persia during 1677 and 1679-80, and he trafficked in very various commodities, including sugar and horses. His ventures proved successful. During 1681 he returned to England. On 15 Feb. 1682 the court of the East India Company gave instructions for a writ ne enent regno against Pitt and one Taylor, 'untill the suit depending in chancery against them by the Company be heard and determined.' Nevertheless, Pitt left England in the Crown on 20 Feb. 1682, and reached Balasore about 8 July, immediately resuming, in the most open manner, his old modes of trading. 'We would have you,' the court writes to Hedges, 'secure his person whatever it cost to the government . . . Be sure to secure him, he being a desperate fellow and one that we fear will not stick at doing any mischief that lies in his power.' Accordingly lledges obtained the consent of the merchant. nawab of Bengal, as the territorial sovereign, to the arrost of Pitt, who, however, after obtaining a permit from the nawab to build a factory on the Hooghly, left for England on 5 Feb. 1683. He was arrested on his arrival at the suit of the company, and was and his own, he was subjected to much hosbound over in recognisances to the amount of 40,000%

The litigation seems to have detained Pitt in England for many years. In 1687 he was fined 1,000l. for interloping, but the court reduced the penalty to 400%. Settling down for the time in Dorset, he purchased and laid out land there, and in both 1689 and 1690 was returned to parliament as member for New Sarum, or Salisbury. In 1690 he bought the manor of Stratford (and Old Sarum) from James Cecil, fourth earl of Salisbury. Without vacating his seat in parliament, he undertook in 1693 his last interloping voyage in the Seymour, in company with one Catchpoole. He arrived at Balasore on 1 Oct. The court and their agents in Bengal made vain efforts to stay his progress. 'Notwithstanding all our endeavours with the nabob and Duan to frustrate and oppose the interlopers in their designs, they are rather countenanced and encouraged by the whole country in generall.' Consequently in January 1094 the court, recognising their inability to resist Pitt, decided to come to terms with the interlopers, and to admit them to the company. Pitt received offers of help from the company, and early in 1695 returned to England, where he was temporarily engaged as agent for the company in the recovery of certain ships from Brest. On 28 Oct. 1695 he was elected M.P. for Old Sarum.

The court of the East India Company quickly recognised Pitt's capacity, and on 26 Nov. 1697 he was appointed president of Fort St. George. His commission, dated 5 Jan. 1698, gave him for twelve months special power to suspend any officer; enjoined strict retrenchment, including, if possible, reduction of the number of officers; and directed Pitt's particular attention to the prevention of interloping, 'he having engaged to us,' as remarked in a despatch to Bengal,' to signalise himself therein.' His term of appointment was for five years, and his salary and allowances 300% a year, with 100% for outfit. According to Sir Josiah Child, 'the adventurers' resented Pitt's appointment to 'such a degree as to turn out eighteen of that committee, whereas I never before knew above eight removed.' On 12 Jan. Robert Pitt, 'son of the president,' was granted permission to reside at Fort St. George as a free

Pitt arrived in Madras on 7 July 1698. On the 11th he entertained all the company's servants and freedmen, by way of celebrating the reading of his commission. Settling down to business, both on the company's account tile criticism, and the court found it neces- remove Pitt and reinstate Fraser. Pitt, with sary to reaffirm their confidence in his management. In May 1690 he was disabled by a fever. During the conflict between the old company, his masters, and the new company, which had been constituted on 5 Sept. 1698, Pitt rehemently defended the interests of the former. When, in September 1699, Sir William Norris [q v.] landed as envoy of the new company to Aurungzib, Pitt declined to recognise him in the absence of orders from the old company. He pursued the new company's agent, his cousin, John Pitt, with the utmost rancour until his death, in 1703, denouncing him as crack-brained and inexperienced. These acrimonious disputes were determined by the union of the i wo rival companies in August 1702, and Put was continued in the presidency of Madras under the united company, to whom, on 3 Oct. 1702, he writes, quoting William's words to the French at Ryswick: "Twas my fate, and noth my choice that made mee Your Enemy; and Since You and My Masters are united, Itt Shall hee my utmost Endeavours to purchase Your Good opinion and deserve your Priendship.

Meanwhile he fearlessly defended the English settlements from attack. In February 1702 Daud Khan, nawab of the Carnatic, blockaded Madras. Pitt met the danger with a characteristic combination of shrowdness and boldness, and on 3 May the nawab retired with a small subsidy, agreeing to restore all that he had taken from the company or its servants (cf. Whinder, Madras in the Olden Time, i. 359-30). In 1703, apparently at his own request, Pitt's term of five years' service was extended. In 1708-9 he opened a nogotiation with the successor to Anrungzib for a commercial arrangement in favour of the company, to which great importance was attached by the inhabitants of Fort St. George, but the negotiation was cut short by Pitt's supersession.

Early in 1704 William Fraser had been appointed a member of his council. Pitt distrusted his new colleague from the first, and differences between them soon followed. In August 1707 a feud arose between certain castes at Madras. Fraser urged, at a council meeting, a mode of settlement which was opposed to that suggested by his chief, but was in agreement with a proposal made in a petition by one of the parties at fend. Pitt at once accused Fraser of collusion with the petitioners, and suspended him from the his conduct which he wrote at Bergen in council, subsequently making him a prisoner 1710, and which was subsequently published at the fort. The matter was referred home, in the 'Daily Post,' 3 Nov. 1743. Pitt and was the subject of deliborate consideration. On 28 Jan. 1709 the court decided to chund, who was finally induced to part with characteristic promptitude, handed over his post and counted up the cash balance in the presence of the councilon 17 Sept. 1709. He left Madras on the Heathcote about 25 Oct., transhipped at the Cape on to a Danish versel. and landed at Bergen, where he stayed for the greater part of a year.

Pitt proved himself a resourceful governor, He maintained considerable pomp, yet the revenues of the factory continuously rose under his guidance. At one time he proposed to give some sort of municipal government within the bounds of the factory. To the value of judicious commercial experiments he was fully alive. Early in 1700 he shipped home new kinds of neck-cloths and chintzes. Sir Nicholas Waite calls him 'the great president,' and Peter Wentworth wrote that the great Pits is turned out.' 'It was his general force of character, his fidelity to the cause of his employers (in spite of his masterfault of koenness in money-making), his decision in dealing with difficulties, that won his reputation. He was always ready; always, till that last burst which brought his recall; cool in action, however bitter in language; he always saw what to do, and did it '(Youn).

During the whole of his stay at Madras Pitt kept a look-out for large diamonds, which he utilised from time to time as a means of sending remittances to the compuny. In December 1701 a native merchant. called Jamehund, brought him a large, rough stone weighing 410 carats, for which he demanded 200,000 pagodas. The stone had been sold to Jamehand by an English skipper, who had stolen it from a slave. The latter had found it in the Parteal mines on the Kistna, and had secreted it in a wound in his leg. It was doubtless a vague knowledge of these circumstances which suggested Pope's lines:

Asloop and naked as an Indian lay, An honest factor stole a gem away ; He pledg'd it to the knight: the knight had So kept the diamond, and the regue was bit.

(Moral Essay, Epist. iii. 361-5). Pope originally ended the last line with 'and was rich as Pitt.' But the imputation that Pitt had stolon the stone was ill-founded, as he proved before the council at Madras, and afterwards by an elaborate justification of doubtless drove a hard bargain with Jam-the diamond for 18,000 pagodas, or 20,400. (at 8s. 6d. per pagoda). He sent it home by his son Robert in October 1702. The cutting was done with great skill in London at a cost of 5,000L, the diamond being reduced to 136; carats in the process. cleavage and dust were valued at from 5.000/. to 7,000/. After many negotiations. during which Pitt knew little rest, and spent most of his time in disguise, the embarrassing treasure was eventually disposed of, through the agency of John Law [q. v.] the financier, to the regent of France for the sum of 135,000l. (see Saint-Simon, Mémoires). Pitt and his two sons themselves took the stone over to Calais in 1717. The gem, which was valued in 1791 at 480,000%, was placed in the French crown, and, although it has experienced many vicissitudes, it is still preserved among the few crown jewels of France that remain unsold (YULE, pp. exxv, sq.: Serndene, Great Diamonds of the World;

WHIDLDR, Hist. of Madras, chap. xxiii.)
On 20 Dec. 1710, when Pitt was settled again in England, the court of the East India Company made arrangements to confer with him on Indian affairs, and not only took his advice, but gave evident signs of regretting his recall. While in India Pitt had looked his recall. after the management of his ' plantation and gardens' in England, and had added to his estates, often showing his dissatisfaction with his wife's conduct of his affairs in his absence. He now began to consolidate his properties. Besides Mawarden Court at properties. Besides Mawarden Court at Stratford and the Down at Blandford, he acquired Boconnoc in Cornwall from Lord Mohun's widow in 1717, and subsequently Kynaston in Dorset, Bradock, Treskillard, and Brannell in Cornwall, Woodyates on the border of Wiltshire, Abbot's Ann in Hampshire, and Swallowfield in Berkshire. He resumed his place in parliament, being elected for Old Sarum on 25 Nov. 1710, and reelected on 16 Feb. 1714 and in 1715, on both occasions with his son as colleague. In 1714 he 'declared himself against every part of the address,' and in 1715 was appointed a commissioner for building new churches under the acts beginning with 9 Anne, c. 22. On 3 Aug. 1716 he accepted the government of Jamaica, and vacated his seat. But he never assumed the office, possibly because he failed to secure instructions to his liking, and he resigned in favour of another. At a byelection on 30 July 1717 he was elected to parliament for Thirsk. In 1722 he was returned for Old Sarum.

Pitt died at Swallowfield, Berkshire, on 28 April 1720, and was buried at Blandford St. Mary's, in the church which he had restored. A stone or brass, with a somewhat 'extravagant laudation' commemorating his benefactions, was extant in the church until 1861, when a restoration swept it away. He also built or restored the churches at Stratford and Abbot's Ann.

Pitt was, above all things, a hard man of business. He gave his son on going up to Oxford characteristic advice: 'Let it ever be a rule never to lend any money but where you have unquestionable security, for generally by asking for it you lose your ffriend and that too.' Yet, despite his intolerance of all mismanagement of money matters, his correspondence gives occasional evidence of kindness, consideration, almost of affection.

Pitt married, in 1678 or 1679, Jane (d. 1727), daughter of James Innes of Reid Hall, Moray, who was descended in the female line from the Earls of Moray. He had three sons and two daughters. His eldest son, Robert, was father of William, earl of Chatham [q. v.]: his second son, Thomas, was created Lord Londonderry [q. v.]; his third son, John (d. 1741), was a soldier of some distinction. His second daughter, Lucy, married, on 24 Feb. 1712-18, General James (afterwards first Earl) Stanhope.

Two portraits of Pitt are extant; one at Boconnoc in Cornwall, with the diamond in his hat; another at Chevening, Sevenoaks, is the property of Earl Stanhope. Both are by Kneller.

[Colonel Yule in vol. iii. of the Diary of William Hodges (Hakkuyt Soc.), 1889, has collected everything which hears on the biography of Pitt. See also Wheeler's Madras in the Olden Times, 1861, vols i. and n. passim; Pope's Works, ed. Elwin and Courthope, iii. 167; Certain Appendices to Life of Lord Chatham, London, 1793, and Collins's Peerage of England, sub 'Chatham,' C. A. H.

PITT, THOMAS, first EARL OF LONDON-DURRY (1688 P-1729), born about 1688, was second son of Thomas Pitt [q.v.], the colonial governor. He represented Wilton in the British House of Commons from August 1713 until the dissolution in July 1727, and served against the rebels in Lancashire in 1715 (Hist. MSS. Comm. 13th Rep. App. iii. p. 55). On 3 June 1719 he was created Baron of Londonderry in the kingdom of Ireland, and took his seat in the Irish House of Lorda on 8 July following (Journals of the Irish House of Lords, ii. 608). On 8 Oct. 1726 he was further advanced to the dignities of Viscount Gallen-Ridgeway of Queen's County and Earl of Londonderry, but he never sat in the Irish House of Lords as an earl (ib. iii. 540). At the general election in August 1727 he was returned to the British House of Commons for Old Sarum, but vacated his seat on his appointment to the post of governor of the Leuward Islands in May 1728. He died at St. Kitts on 12 Sept. 1729, aged 41, and was buried in the family vault at Blandford.

He married, on 10 March 1717, Lady Frances Ridgeway, younger daughter and coheiress of Robert, fourth and last earl of Londonderry (created 1623), by whom he left two sous—viz.(1) Thomas, who succeeded as second earl, and died from a fall from his horse on 21 Aug. 1734, aged 17; (2) Ridgeway, who succeeded as third earl, and died unmarried on 8 Jan. 1765, aged 43, when all the honours became extinct-and one daughter, Lucy, who became the wife of Pierce Meyrick, the youngest son of Owen Meyrick of Bodorgan, Anglesey. His widow, who inherited the Cudworth estate in Yorkshire, married, in December 1732, Robert Graham, of South Warnborough, Hampshire, and died on 18 May 1772. There is no record of any speech made by him either in the Irish House of Lords or in the British House of Commons.

[Hutchins's Ristory of Dorset, 2nd edit. i. 99; Boyer's Political State of Great Britain, xxxviii. 492; Gent. Mag. 1734 p. 452, 1765 p. 46, 1772 p. 247; Burke's Extinct Pecrage, 1883 pp. 429, 430, 453; G. E. C.'s Complete Pecrage, 1893, v. 130-1: Collins's Poorage of England, 1812, v. 46; Official Return of Lists of Members of Parliament, pt. ii. pp. 34, 45, 57, 68; Haydn's Book of Dignities, 1890, p. 727; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. v. 227.] G. F. R. B.

PITT, THOMAS, first Baron Cambuford (1737-1793), politician and connoisseur of art, born and baptised at Boconnoc in Cornwall on 3 March 17:36-7, was the only son of Thomas Pitt (d. 1760), lord warden of the Stannaries. William Pitt, first earl of Chatham [q. v.], was his father's elder brother. His mother was Christian, eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Lyttelton, bart., of Hagley. He was admitted fellow-commoner at Clare College, Cambridge, on 7 Jan. 1754, and resided there until 1758. While at the university his uncle, William Pitt, sent him much advice in a series of sensible and affectionate letters, which were printed in 1804, and were included, together with the nephew's replies, in the 'Chatham Correspondence.' In 1759 Pitt obtained the degree of M.A. per literas regias.

Pitt's health was bad even as an undergraduate; he was 'troubled with fits.' In search of a cure he accompanied Lord Kinnoull, British ambassador to the court of Portugal, on his journey to Lisbon in January 1760. Gray and his friends contrived that Lord Strathmore, a college companion, should go with him; and Philip Francis, who praises. Pitt and Strathmore as 'most amiable young men,' and retained throughout life the warmest attachment for Pitt, also joined the expedition. They entered the Tagus on 7 March 1760, and left Lisbon on 21 May 1760. Passing through Spain to Barcelona, they crossed to Genoa, and passed some time in Italy. Pitt corresponded with Gray, by whom he is called 'no bad observer,' and wrote a manuscript journal of his travels, a copy of which formerly belonged to Mr. Richard Bentley, and a second copy, by the Rev. William Cole, transcribed from that in the possession of Richard Gough, is No. 5845 of the Additional MSS. in the British Museum. Gough speaks with pleasure of this 'most delicious tour, with most accurate descriptions, and some plans.' Cole notes that the description of the bull-fight in the manuscript is identical with that in the Rev. E. Clarke's 'Letters on the Spanish Nation,' 1763 (pp. 107-13). Horace Walpole intro-duced Pitt to Sir Horace Mann at Florence as 'not a more matter of form, but an earnest suit to know him well, and praised his conduct in cutting off the entail to pay his father's debts and to provide for his sisters. Pitt was staying at Florence with his uncle. Sir Richard Lyttelton, and making himself very popular, when news arrived of the death of his father, on 17 July 1761.

He now became owner of the controlling interest in the parliamentary representation of Old Sarum and a considerable share in that of Okehampton in Devonshire. He accordingly sat for the former borough from December 1701 to the dissolution in March 1768, for Okehampton in the parliament from 1768 to 1774, and for Old Sarum from 1774 until his elevation to the peerage in January 1784. He followed in politics his near relative, George Grenville, who made him a lord of the admiralty in his ministry of 1763. He was invited, in compliment to his uncle, Chatham, to continue in office with the Rockingham ministry; but he was politically at variance with Chatham, and followed Grenville into opposition (cf. WALPOLE, Memoirs of George III, i. 339-43, WALPOLE, Letters, iv. 238-45, and The Grenville Papers, ii. 232, 320-00).

At intervals Pitt played an active part in politics. He was one of the seventy-two whig members who met at the Thatched House Tavern, London, on 9 May 1769, to celebrate the rights of electors in the struggle for the representation of Middlesex; he seconded Sir William Meredith in his attempt to relax the subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles, and he spoke against the Royal Marriage Bill. Through his influence, supported by Lady Chatham, the reconciliation of his uncle and Lord Temple was effected Walpole, who quarrelled with him on political topics, calls him a 'flimsy' speaker, though not wanting in parts; but Wraxall recognised in him the possession of no ordinary powers of oratory, and remarked that, although he rarely spoke, his name and family relations 'procured him a most fa-vourable audience.' It was acknowledged on all sides that he never spoke so well as in his speech in 1780 on Dunning's celebrated motion to limit the influence of the crown. He was one of the strongest opponents of Lord North's ministry, and a warm antagonist of the coalition. In November 1781 he protested against voting supplies until grievances were redressed, in a speech to which Fox referred in his own justification on 4 Jan. 1798, when opposing the passage of the Assessed Taxes Bill (Hansard, xxxiii, 1230). In February 1783 he moved the address for the Shelburne ministry, protesting that he had always been opposed to the use of force against the American colonies, and he attacked Fox's East India Bill with energy.

A very favourable account is given by Wraxall of his speech in 1782 against parliamentary reform, in which he did not 'make a false step,' although hampered by the knowledge that he was returned to the House of Commons in respect of a single tenement. Next year, when the same question was brought forward, he incurred much ridicule by a change of opinion, and by an offer to sacrifice his borough for the public good. He was satirised by the authors of the 'Rolliad' (ed. 1795, pp. 171-2), and he was mercilessly chaffed in the House of Commons by Fox (13 March 1784) and Burke (28 Feb. 1785). In March 1788, when the king was endeavouring to form an administration in opposition to North and Fox, the leadership of the House of Commons and the seals of a secretary of state were 'offered to and pressed upon Thomas Pitt' (BUCKINGHAM, Court of George III, 1853, i. 190), although Lord Ashburton, who conferred with the king on the subject, pleaded that he was a 'wrongheaded man' (FITZMAURICE, Life of Shelburne, ii. 375-82). On 5 Jan. 1784 he was raised to the prerage as Baron Camelford of Boconnoc, a signal proof, as was generally remarked, of the influence of his cousin, the young William Pitt (cf. Chatham Correspondence, iv. 526-7).

Ill-health often drove him to the continent. From 1789 to 1792 he was in Italy, and, although he landed at Deal in June 1792, he was obliged to fee to the continent again in September. Peter Beckford says in his 'Familiar Letters' (1805 edit. i. 159), that Lord Camelford 'left Florence for Pisa with the gout upon him, and died immediately on his arrival;' but it is generally said that he died at Florence on 19 Jan. 1793. He was buried on 2 March at Boconnoc, where he had added to the old mansion, from his own designs, a second wing, in which is a gallery sixty-five feet long, containing many family and other portraits. In 1771 he had erected, on the hill above the house, an obelisk, 123 feet high, to the memory of his uncle, Sir Richard Lyttelton (Parochial Hist. of Cornwall, i. 74-5).

Pitt married, on 28 or 29 July 1771, Anne, younger daughter and coheiress of Pinckney Wilkinson, a rich merchant of Hanover Square, London, and Burnham, Norfolk. She had 'thirty thousand pounds down and at least as much more in expectation,' wrote Gray. She died at Camelford House, Oxford Street, London, on 5 May 1803, aged 65, pining from grief at the career of her son, and was buried in the vault in Boconnoc churchyard on 19 May. Their issue was one son, Thomas, second earl of Camelford, who is separately noticed, and one daughter, Anne, born in September 1772. In March 1773 William Wyndham Grenville, baron Grenville [q. v.], wrote that the girl was 'either dying or actually dead,' but she lived to marry him in 1792, and survived until June 1864.

Lady Camelford's sister Mary made an unhappy marriage, in 1760, with Captain John Smith, by whom she was mother of Admiral Sir Sidney Smith. Camelford, who treated his sister-in-law and her children with much kindness, printed in 1785 a 'Narrative and Proofs' of Smith's bad con-duet (Bibl. Cornub. ii. 500).

Pitt was high-minded, generous, and distinguished for suavity of manners, but was of irresolute temperament. Sir Egerton Brydges describes him as 'a man of some talents and very elegant acquirements in the arts' (Collins, Peerage, ix. 488). Mrs. Piozzi, with more emphasis, calls him 'a finical, lady-like man' (Piozzi, Notes on Wrarall, ed. 1836, vol. iv. addenda p. vii), and by Sir J. Eardley-Wilmot he was dubbed in 1765 the prince of all the male beauties,' and 'very well bred, polite, and sensible' (Wilmot, Memoirs, p. 182).

Several fugitive tracts have been loosely assigned to Camelford. Sir John Sinclair credits him with a roply to his own 'Lucubrations during a Short Recess,' 1782 (Corresp.

vol. i. pp. xxviii, xxix). A few days after his elevation to the peerage a pamphlet, in which 'the constitutional right of the House of Commons to advise the sovereign ' was warmly upheld, was attributed to Camelford, and referred to in parliament by Burke, who also ridiculed him as the alleged author of a tract relating to parliamentary reform. In the autumn of 1789 Camelford found it necessary to deny that he had published a treatise on French affairs. He is included in Park's edition of Walpole's 'Royal and Noble Authors,' iv. 348-50, as 'the reputed author of a tract concerning the American war.'

From March 1762 Pitt lived at Twickenham, playfully calling his house the 'Paluzzo Pitti.' He was then the neighbour of Horace Walpole, who recognised his skill in Gothic architecture, and went so far as to call him 'my present architect.' On the death in 1779 of the second Earl of Harrington, he bought the lease of Petersham Lodge (beneath Richmond Park, but now demolished and the grounds included in the park boundaries), and he purchased the feesimple in 1784 from the crown, an act of parliament being passed for that purpose. In 1790 it was sold by him to the Duke of Clarence. Pitt also built Camelford House, fronting Oxford Street, at the top of Park Lane, London; and as a member of the Dilettanti Society, to which he had been elected on 1 May 1763, he proposed in February 1785 that the shells of two adjoining houses constructed by him in Hereford Street should be completed by the society for a public museum, but considerations of expense put a stop to the project. He interested himself greatly in the porcelain manufactory at Plymouth, where employment was found for the white saponaceous clay found on his land in Cornwall (Polyheld, Devonthire, i. 60; POLWHDLU, Reminiscences, i. 79-80; PRIDEAUX, Relics of Corkworthy, pp. 4-5; OWDN, Two Centuries of Ceramic Art, pp. 77-8, 115-16, 139-14). Angelica Kauffmann wrote to him on the free importation into England by artists of their own studies and designs (J. T. SMITH, Book for a Rainy Day, 1861, pp. 186-7). Pitt was a friend of Mrs. Delany, to whom he gave for her lifetime portraits of Sir Bevil Grenville, his wife, and his father, and he proposed to Count Bruhl that they should jointly assist Thomas Mudge in his plans for the improvement of nautical chronometers. The wainscoting of the stalls in Carlisle Cathedral, where his uncle, Charles Lyttelton, was bishop, was designed by him.

Pitt's letters to George Hardinge are printed in Nichols's 'Illustrations of Literature, vi. 74-189. Some of the originals were sold on 5 Dec. 1874, from the library of John Gough Nichols. Further letters by Pitt are in the British Museum, Additional MS. 28060, and Egerton MSS. 1969, 1970. Some letters written to him by the second William Pitt are among the Fortescue MSS. (Hist. MSS. Comm. 13th Rep. App. pt. iii, pp. 219, 558, 591-2).

Pitt's portrait by Romney, a favourable specimen of the artist's talents, depicts him dressed in a scarlet suit and seated, resting his left elbow on a table. His daughter's portrait, by Madame Vigée le Brun, represented her as Hebe. It was painted at Rome in the winter of 1789-90, when she is described as 'sixteen, and very pretty.' Both portraits belong to the Fortescues of Boconnoc (Archaol. Journ. xxxi. 26).

[Gent. Mag. 1771 p. 377, 1793 pt. i. pp. 91, 141, 1803 pt. i. p. 485; Hutchins's Dorset (1861 edit.), i. 164; Merivale's Life of Str P. Francis, i. 29, 331, ii. 217; Fitzmaurice's Lord Shelburno, ii. 375–82, iii. 79, 345; Souvenirs of Madame Vigée le Brun, i. 192-3; Gray's Works, ed. Gosse, ii. 378, iii. 28, 30, 85, 98-9. 406; Walpole's Memoirs of George III, i. 259. 396, ii. 194; Walpole's Journal of George III. i. 9-11, 43, 64, 368, ii. passim; Walpole's Letters, vol. i. p. xcvi, iii. 286, 102, 422, 470, 497, 501, 504, iv. 112, v. 312, vii. 58, 127, 348; Miss Berry's Journals, i. 181-3; Wraxall's Hist, Memoirs (ed. 1836), ii. 442-6, 511, 520-1, iii. 82-4, 98, 240-1, 400-6, iv. 571, 692-3; Nichols's Lit. Anecd. viii. 588; Hansard, xxiv. 848, 762, xxv. 218; Grenville Papers, ii. 198, iii. 79, 241; Letters of Gray and Mason, pp. 109-10, 200-2, 255-6, 484, 508, 513; Barrow's Sir Sidney Smith, ii. 120; Lysous's Environs, i. 400; Duke of Buckingham's Court of George III, i. 190, 207-213, ii. 198, 213-18; PHRIS RUNGE MARIES, p. 59; Mrs. Delany's Life, v. 3 t0-1, 100, vi. 488; Boase and Courtney's Bibl. Cornub, ii. 498-500, iii. 1314; Boase's Collect. Cornub, p. 740; information from Rev. Dr. Atkinson, Clave Coll. Cambridge.] W. P. C. 213, ii. 198, 213-16; Flint's Mudge Memoirs,

PITT, THOMAS, second Baron Campi-FORD (1775-1804), commander in the navy and duellist, only son of Thomas Piti, first lord Camelford [q. v.], was born at Bo-connoc in Cornwall on 19 Feb. 1775. He passed his early years in Switzerland, and was afterwards at the Charterhouse. In the autumn of 1781 his name was borne for a couple of months on the books of the Tobago, but in reality he entered the navy in September 1789 on board the Guardian, an old 44-gun ship fitted to carry out stores to New South Wales, under the command of Lieutenant Edward Riou [q. v.] When the ship, after striking on an ice-field near the Cape of Good Hope, was deserted by a great part of the ciew, Pitt was one of those who remained and succeeded in bringing the wreck into Table Bay. In March 1791 he joined the Discovery, with Captain George Vancouver [q. v.], and continued in her for nearly three years, in the survey of Northwest America. On 7 Feb. 1794 Pitt, who by the death of his father on 19 Jan. 1793 had become Lord Camelford, was, for some act of insubordination, discharged to the During the following shore at Hawaii. months he reached Malacca, apparently in a trading vessel, and on 8 Dec. was entered as an able seaman on board the Resistance. Three weeks later he was appointed actinglieutenant of the Resistance, but on 24 Nov. 1795 was summarily discharged and left to find his own way to England. He took a passage in a country ship named the Union, which was cast away on the coast of Ceylon in December. In September 1796 he joined the Tisiphone in the North Sea, and a fortnight later was moved to the London in the Channel fleet. On 5 April 1797 he passed his examination, and about the same time challenged Vancouver, who expressed his willingness to go out if any flag-officer to whom the case might be referred should decide that he owed Camelford satisfaction. Camelford refused any such reference, and, meeting Vancouver in the street, was only prevented from caning him by the bystanders.

1239

On 7 April 1797 Camelford was promoted to the rank of lieutenant: on 2 Aug. he joined the Vengeance with Captain Thomas Macnamara Russell [q. v.], on the Leeward Islands station; and on 13 Sept. was appointed by Russell, then senior officer at St. Kitts, to command the Favourite sloop, whose captain had been invalided. Russell, who had no authority to give any promotion, made out the order of appointment as that of 'acting commander.' On 16 Sept. the appointment was repeated by Rear-admiral Henry Harvey, the commander-in-chief, then at Martinique, who, having full authority to give an acting commission, appointed Camelford 'lioutenant commanding' of the Farancial.

Charles Peterson, the first lieutenant of the Favourite at the time, was Camelford's senior by nearly two years, and his practical supersession by Camelford caused him much indignation. He contrived to transfer himself to the Perdrix frigate, then commanded by Captain William Charles Fahie [q. v.] On 18 Jan. 1798 the two ships, Perdrix and Favourite, were alone in English Harbour, Antigua, both alongside the dockyard, relitting. Fahie was on leave, and Peterson claimed to be senior officer in the port, both as the representative of Fahie and as Camelford's senior on the lieutenants' list. Camelford, repudiating such a pretension, sent in writing to Peterson a formal order, describing himself as 'commanding his Majesty's sloop Favourite and senior officer.' Peterson addressed a counter-order to Camelford, describing himself as 'commander of his Majesty's ship Perdrix and senior officer.' Camelford on this sent a lieutenant of the Favourite with a party of marines to repeat the order and to arrest Peterson if he refused to obey. Peterson prepared to defend himself, and the lieutenant, not caring to use force, withdrew. Camelford himself then went to the wharf alongside of which the Perdrix was lying, and Peterson, calling to the men of the Perdrix to come on shore and fall in, went out to meet him. As the Favourite's marines formed up behind Camelford, Peterson gave his men the order to load with ball cartridge. Camelford, advancing, inquired if Peterson refused to obey his orders. 'I do,' replied Peterson. Camelford snatched a pistol from one of his officers, presented it at Peterson, putting the same question a second and a third time, and receiving the same answer. At the third refusal he fired, and Peterson fell dead.

On 20 Jan. Camelford was brought to trial before a court-martial at Martinique. According to naval law, Peterson was the senior officer, and Camelford was the mutineer. But, without entering into the facts of his appointment, the court assumed the truth of Camelford's statement that he was senior officer and that Peterson was guilty of mutiny, and he was honourably acquitted. This decision can only be explained by the supposition that, with the knowledge of the occurrences at Spithead and the Nore, of the disturbed state of the fleet off Cadiz, and of the recent loss of the Hermione [see Pigor, Hugh, 1769-1797], the court was panicstricken at the very name of mutiny (Minutes of the Court Martial, in the Public Record Office; they have been printed, 1799, 8vo).

Meanwhile Camelford was promoted by the admiralty on 12 Dec. 1797, and on 4 May 1798 exchanged into the Terror bomb, which he took to England. In October 1798 he was appointed to the Charon, and, while fitting her out, resolved to go to Paris in order to get a set of French charts. At Dover he obtained from M. Bompard, then a prisoner of war [see Warrin, Sir John Borlasu], a letter of introduction to Barras. He was described as a man willing to render important service to France. The boatmen whom he hired to take him to Calais, however, were suspicious, and handed him over to the collector of customs, who searched him, found the letter to Barras, and sent him up as a prisoner to the secretary of state. After a prolonged examination before the privy council he was set at liberty; but the admiralty, disapproving of his conduct, superseded him from the command of the Charon. Camelford indignantly requested that his name might be struck off the list of commanders, which was done (Marshall, Roy.

Nav. Biogr. iii. 202).

For the next few years he lived principally in London, where he achieved an extraordinary notoriety by disorderly conduct. On 7 May 1799 he was fined 500% for knocking a Mr. Humphries downstairs in a quarrel at the theatre (True Briton, 17 May 1799). On 7 Oct. 1801, when there was a general illumination in the west-end for the peace, the house in Bond Street in which Camelford lodged was by his orders left in darkness. The mob hammered at the door. Camelford rushed out and began striking the spectators right and left with a thick bludgeon. Finally, all the lower windows of the house were smashed, and he himself injured (Times, 8 Oct. 1801). Camelford afterwards entered an action against the county for the damage done by the mob (ib. 17 Oct.) story of another quarrel and fight at the theatre in February 1804 is related by two eye-witnesses, James and Horace Smith [q. v.], who called next day at Camelford's lodgings in Bond Street to say that, if wanted, they were ready to give evidence that he had been assaulted. Camelford received them with great civility. 'Over the fireplace in the drawing-room, they wrote, were ornaments strongly expressive of the pugnacity of the peer. A long thick bludgeon lay horizontally supported by two brass hooks. Above this was placed parallel one of lesser dimensions, until a pyramid of weapons gradually arose, tapering to a horse whip' (Rejected Addresses, 'The Rebuilding, by R. S.') A fortnight later, on 6 March, while in a coffee-house, he met a former friend and an admirable shot, Mr. Best, and grossly insulted him. A woman with whom Best had lived had told Camelford that Best had spoken of him in disparaging terms. The two men met next morning in the meadows to the west of Holland House, close by where Melbury Road now runs. Camelford fired first, missed his man, and fell mortally wounded by Best's return. He died on 10 March 1804.

By his will, written the night before the duel, he made a particular request that no one should be proceeded against for his death, as the quarrel was entirely of his own seeking. A verdict of wilful murder, against some person unknown, was returned at the inquest. He desired to be buried in Switzerland, at an indicated spot which he had known in his childhood. The body was accordingly embalmed and packed in a long basket, but the course of the war prevented its being taken abroad, and it was left for many years in the crypt of St. Anne's Church, Soho, probably thrust into some vault, and was eventually lost sight of (RDADE. What has become of Lord Camelford's body ?' in Jilt and other Stories). He was not married, and by his death the title became extinct. Camelford is said by those who knew him personally to have been capable of better things than his misspent life seemed to promise. He read largely, and was especially devoted to the study of mathematics, chemistry, and theology, which last he took up according to his own story—out of a desire to find matter to puzzle the chaplain of his He was free with his money, generous and kind to those in trouble.

[Life, Adventures, and Eccentricities of the late Lord Camelford (1804), a vulgar but fairly accurate chapbook, which is now rare; there is a copy in the Library of the Royal United Service Institution. Gent. Mag. 1804, i. 284; Ann. Reg. 1804, p. 470; Cockburne's Authentic Account of the late unfortunate Death of Lord Camelford; other authorities in the text.]

PITT, WILLIAM, first Earl of Chit-HAM (1708-1778), statesman, was born in Westminster on 15 Nov. 1708, and was baptised at St. James's, Piccadilly, on 18 Dec. He was the younger son of Robert Pitt of Boconnoc in Cornwall, by his wife Harriet, younger daughter of the Hon. Edward Villiers of Dromana, co. Waterford, and grandson of Governor Thomas Pitt (1653-1726) [q. v.] He was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Oxford, where he matriculated on 14 Jan. 1727. Having suffered severoly from gout, he was advised to travel for the sake of his health. He therefore left the university without taking a degree, and spent some time in France and Italy. He returned to England, however, little better for the change, and continued through life subject to attack by his hereditary disease. As his means were limited, it was necessary that he should choose a profession. He decided for the army, and obtained a cornetcy in the king's own regiment of horse, otherwise known as Lord Cobham's horse, on 9 Feb. 1731. Four years later he entered parliament. At a by-election in February 1785 he succeeded his elder brother, Thomas, in the representation of the family borough of Old Sarum. He immediately joined Pulteney's party of the 'patriots' in opposition to Walpole. He spoke for the first time in the House of Commons on 29 April 1736, when he supported Pulteney's motion for a congratulatory address to the king on the marriage of the Prince of Wales (Parl. Hist. ix. 1221-3). Its covert satire was so offensive to the king that he was shortly afterwards dismissed from the army. 'We must muzzle this terrible young cornet of horse,' Walpole is reported to have said. The vacancy made by 'the supersession of Cornet Pitt' was filled up on 17 May 1736 (Quarterly Review, lxvi. 194). On 22 Feb. 1737 Pitt warmly supported Pulteney's motion for an address to the king, praying that an annuity of 100,000% might be settled on the Prince of Wales, and in September following he was appointed groom of the bed-chamber to the prince. In February 1738 he spoke in favour of the reduction of the army (Parl. Hist. x. 461-7). On 8 March 1739 he attacked the convention with Spain, which he described as 'nothing but a stipulation for national ignominy '(ib. x. 1280-3).

On this occasion Pitt seems first to have shown his great powers of oratory. He is said by a contemporary writer to have spoken 'very well but very abusively,' and to have 'provoked Mr. Henry Fox and Sir Henry Liddell both to answer him '(Coxe's Walpole, 1798, in. 519). On 13 Feb. 1741 Pitt supported Sandys's motion for the removal of Walpole (Parl. Hist. al. 1359-64). In the following month he violently opposed Walpole's bill for the encouragement and increase of seamen (ib. xii. 104-5, 115-16, 117). In the account of this debate, furnished by Dr. Johnson to the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for November 1741 (p. 569), Pitt is made to deliver the celebrated retort to Horace Walpole the elder, beginning 'The atrocious crime of being a young man.'
Pitt possibly said something of the kind on this occasion, but the phrasing of the retort is clearly Johnson's. An incident of a similar nature appears to have occurred between Pitt and the elder Walpole some four years later (Walpold, Letters, 1857-9, i. 405).

At the general election in May 1741 Pitt was again returned for Old Sarum. On Walpole's downfall in 1742 he and the 'boy patriots' tried to come to an understanding with the ex-minister, promising to screen him from prosecution if he would use his influence with the king in their favour (MACAULAX, Essays, 1852, ii. 167-8). The proposal was, however, declined. Pitt was not included in Pelham's ministry, and became still more active and acrimonious in his denunciations of Walpole. He supported both of Lord Limerick's motions for an inquiry into Walpole's conduct (Parl. Hist. xii. 482-95, 525-8, 553-63, 567-72), was appointed a member of the secret committee of inquiry, and voted for the bill of indemnity to the witnesses. He also supported George (afterwards first baron) Lyttelton [q. v.] on 1 Dec. 1742 in his attempt to procure the appointment of another committee of inquiry into Walpole's conduct (WALPOLE, Letters, i. 217).

On 6 Dec. 1742 Pitt took part in the debate on continuing the army in Flanders, and replied to Murray's maiden speech 'in the most masterly manner' (Memorials of the Right Hon. James Osuald, 1825, p. 3; see also Walpold's Letters, i. 218). Four days afterwards he attacked the practice of paying Hanoverian troops with English money, and declared with great violence that it was too apparent that Great Britain was 'considered only as a province to a despicable electorate' (Parl. Hist. xii. 1083-6). At the opening of the next session, on 1 Dec. 1743, Pitt opposed the address, and stigmatised Carteret as 'an execrable, a sole minister, who had renounced the British nation, and seemed to have drunk of the potion described in poetic fictions, which made men forget their country' (ib. xiii. 135-6 n., 152-70; WALPOLE, Letters, i. 280). Pitt continued to abuse Carteret and oppose his Hanoverian policy throughout the session, but he supported Pelham's motion for an augmentation of the forces, in view of the threatened invasion by the Pretender (Parl. Hist. xiii. 666-7, n.) His determined opposition to the system of foreign subsidies, though displeasing to the king, was very popular in the country. The eccentric Ducliess of Marlborough, who died in October 1744, left him a legacy of 10,0001. 'upon account of his merit in the noble defence he has made for the support of the laws of England, and to prevent the ruin of his country' (Almon, Anecdotes of the Life of the Earl of Chatham, 1793, i. 197). one of the committee of nine appointed by the opposition to consider the question of a coalition with the Pelhams against Carteret (who became Earl Granville on 18 Oct. 1744), he gave his vote in favour of joining the Pelhams without exacting any stipulations ( Bedford Correspondence, 1842-1846, vol. i. p. xxxiv).

On Granville's dismissal in November 1744, several of Pitt's political associates obtained seats in the 'Broad-bottom' administration. But Pitt had to be content with promises. Though he resigned his place in the prince's household, the king refused to forgive his opposition to the foreign subsidies and the contemptuous tone in which he had spoken of Hanover. Nevertheless he gave the government the constant support of his eloquence. On 23 Jan. 1745, although he had been laid up with gout since the session began, he complimented Pelham 'on that true love of his country and capacity for business which he had always shown,' and commended the 'moderate and healing' measures of the ministry (Parl. Hist. xiii. 1054-6, n.) On 18 Feb. he supported Polham's motion for the grant of a subsidy to Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary, which he described as a meritorious and popular measure' (ib. xiii. 1176-8, n.) At the opening of parliament in October he opposed Dashwood's amendment to the address as 'very unseasonable' (ib. xiii. 1348-51), and in the following month he warmly supported the cause of the new regiments which had been raised for the suppression of the Jacobite rebellion (ib. xiii. 1387-91; WALPOLD, Letters, i. 400). Pitt appears to have 'alternately bullied and flattered' Pelham in order to obtain the post of secretary of war (ib. i. 400, 405). Polham was inclined to yield, but the king still objected strongly to Pitt, and the ministers, hearing of the king's intention to dismiss them, resigned office in February 1746. On the failure of Granville and Bath to form an administration Pelham returned to power, and Pitt was reluctantly appointed by the king joint vice-treasurer of Ireland with George, third earl of Cholmondeley, on 22 Feb. 1746 (Coxu, Pelham Administration, 1829, i. 292-6).

Though not gratified to the extent of his wishes, Pitt zealously defended the ministerial measures, and in April supported the employment of eighteen thousand Hanoverians in Flanders. He spoke so well on this occasion that Pelham told the Duke of Newcastle that he 'had the dignity of Sir William Wyndham, the wit of Mr. Pulteney, and the knowledge and judgment of Sir Robert Walpole' (ib. i. 309). On 6 May 1746 he was promoted to the important post of paymaster-general of the forces, and on the 24th of the same month was sworn a member of the privy council. Greatly to his honour, and unlike his predecessors, Pitt declined to accept a farthing from his new office beyond the salary legally attaching to it. He refused either to appropriate to himself the interest of the huge balances in his hands, or to accept the commission of onehalf per cent. which foreign powers had been accustomed to pay on receipt of their subsidies. Owing to this disinterested conduct, Pitt, notwith-standing the grave inconsistencies of which he had been guilty since dranville's downfall, secured a large share of the public confidence.

At the general election in June 1747 Pitt was returned, through the influence of the government, for Seaford. The Duke of Newcastle is said to have personally interfered in the election in his behalf, but the petition against his return was dismissed by a majority of 151 votes (Parl. Hist. xiv. 101-8). He continued to give a zealous support to the Pelhams, but, in spite of his abject submission, he failed to overcome the king's aversion (Chatham Correspondence, 1888-40, i. 49). At the opening of the session in January 1751 Pitt warmly defended the new treaties with Spain and Bavaria, and declared that he was no longer an advocate for resisting the right of search claimed by Spain (Parl. Hist. xiv. 798-804). He opposed the ministerial plan for the reduction of the naval establishment, because of his 'fears of Jacobitism.' No other ground, he protested, would have induced him 'to differ with those with whom I am determined to lead my life' (Coxn, Memoirs of the Pelham Administration, ii. 143-4; WALPOLE, Letters, ii. 239-40). On 22 Feb. he supported the Bavarian subsidy 'in a good but too general speech' (WALPOLD, Memoirs of the Reign of George II, 1847, i. 49; Parl. Hist. xiv. 963-70).

During this session the long-smothered rivalry between Pitt and Henry Fox (afterwards first baron Holland) [q. v.] became very apparent, especially in the discussion of the Regency Bill, necessitated by the death of the Prince of Wales (WALPOLE, Letters, ii. 242; Dodington, Diary, 1784, p. 121). On Pelham's death in March 1754 the Duko of Newcastle was appointed first lord of the treasury; but, much to Pitt's resentment, this change brought him no promotion. At the general election in the following month he was returned to the House of Commons for Aldborough, a pocket borough belonging to the Duke of Newcastle. On 14 Nov. he obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of the Chelsea out-pensioners (Parl. Hist. xv. 374-5), which passed through both houses without opposition, and received the royal assent in the following month (28 George II, cap. i). Reconciled for a time by their common interest, Pitt and Fox vied with each other in ridiculing Sir Thomas Robinson, to whom Newcastle had entrusted the leadership of the House of Commons. On 25 Nov. Pitt suddenly startled the commons by an attack upon the duke himself. a remarkable speech he called on the members to assist in preserving the dignity of the house, lest they 'should only sit to register the arbitrary edicts of one too powerful a subject.' Two days later he made a scathing attack upon Murray, the new attorney-general, a great favourite of the prime minister (WALPOLE, Memoirs of the Reign of George II, i. 108, 412-14; WALDIGRAVE, Memoirs, 1821, pp. 146-8, 150-2). According to Horace Walpole, Pitt delivered 'one of his best worded and most spirited declamations for liberty' during the discussion of the Scottish Sheriff-depute Bill on 26 Feb. 1755 (Memoirs of the Reign of George II, ii. 5). In April the short-lived alliance between Pitt and Fox was broken off by Fox's acceptance of a seat in the cabinet, a desertion which Pitt never forgot or forgave (ib. ii. 37-39; Chatham Correspondence, i. 132-3).

Pitt now connected himself with Leicester House, and agreed to support the Princess of Wales and her son, afterwards George III, against Newcastle, who had hitherto been her favourite minister (WALDEGRAVE, Memoirs, pp. 37-9). During the summer Newcastlo and Hardwicke vainly endeavoured to induce Pitt to give his cordial assistance to the ministry. Pitt, however, 'was very explicit, and fairly let them know that he expected to be secretary of state and would not content himself with any meaner employment' (ib. p. 44). When the Hessian treaty was brought to the treasury, Legge, the chancellor of the exchequer, refused, at Pitt's instigation, to sign the treasury warrants for carrying it into execution. At the opening of parliament on 13 Nov. Pitt delivered a brilliant and powerful speech against the subsidies. 'He spoke,' says Horace Walpole in a letter to his friend Conway, 'at past one for an hour and thirty-five minutes. There was more humour, wit, vivacity, finer language, more boldness, in short, more astonishing perfections, than even you, who are used to him, can conceive' (WALPOLII, Letters, ii. 484). It was in the course of this speech that Pitt made the famous comparison between the coalition of Fox and Newcastle and the juncture of the Rhone and the Saone (WALPOLE, Memoirs of George II, ii. 58). Pitt and Legge were dismissed from their respective offices on 20 Nov. 1755. As his means were narrow, Pitt induced his brother-in-law, Temple, to lend him 1,000l. a year till better times (Grenville Papers, 1852-3, i. 149-52).

Throughout 1755 hostilities had been continual between the English and French in North America, and early in 1756 the rupture with France became complete. Pitt supported the government in their attempt to render the army and navy more effective, and spoke warmly in favour of the establishment of a real militia force, but continued his attacks on the subsidies to German princes. During the debate on Lyttelton's motion for a vote of credit for a million in May 1756, Pitt roundly abused the ministers for their incapacity. His charge, he said, was that 'we had provoked before we could defend, and neglected after provocation; that we were left interior to France in every quarter; that the vote of credit had been misapplied to secure the electorate; and that we had bought a treaty with Prussia by sacrificing our rights' (WALPOLE, Memoirs of the Reign of George II, ii. 191-7). The disastrous events—the loss of Minorca, the defeat of Braddock at Fort Duquesne, the capture of Calcutta by Surajah Dowlah, and the horrors of the Black Hole-which followed the prorogation of parliament completed the unpopularity of Newcastle's ministry, and made Pitt's accession to power an inevitable necessity. The king, at length finding that he had no alternative but to call in the popular favourite, authorised Hardwicke to open negotiations with Pitt, who boldly refused to take any part in the administration while the Duke of Newcastle remained. Upon the duke's declaration of his intention to resign in November 1756, Fox was directed to form an administration with Pitt. But Pitt also refused to act with Fox. After further negotiationthe Duke of Devonshire consented to become first lord of the treasury, while Pitt, the actual premier, became secretary of state for the southern department (4 Dec. 1750) and the leader of the House of Commons. The great seal was put in commission, Legge was made chancellor of the exchequer, Temple first lord of the admiralty, and George Grenville treasurer of the navy. Having vacated his seat at Aldborough by the acceptance of office, Pitt was returned for Buckingham and Okehampton, and elected to sit for Okehampton.

Distrusted by the king, and feebly supported in the House of Commons, where the Duke of Newcastle's corrupt influence was still dominant, Pitt soon found that he was unable to carry on the government of the country with the aid of public opinion alone. Vigorous measures were, however, immediately taken to increase the army, the Hessians were dismissed, a bill for the establishment of a national militia was brought in, and, in order to allay the disloyalty of the Scots, the recommendation originally made by Duncan Forbes in 1788 was carried into effect by the formation of two regiments out of the highland clans. During the earlier part of the winter Pitt was laid up with a severe attack of gout. He made his first appearance as leader of the house on 17 Feb. 1757, when he delivered a message from the king, desiring support for his electoral dominions and the king of Prussia (WALPOLE, Memoirs of the Reign of George II, ii. 313). On the following day Pitt proposed a vote of 200,000% on that account, and was unkindly reminded by Fox that he had said 'the German measures of last year would be a millstone about the neck of the minister' (ib. ii. 314). In the same month he pleaded unsuccessfully with the king for Admiral Byng. When he urged that the House of Commons was inclined to mercy, the king shrewdly replied, 'Sir, you have taught me to look for the sense of my subjects in another place than the House of Commons' (ib. ii. 331). To Waldegrave the king expressed his dislike of Pitt and Temple in very strong terms, and complained that 'the secretary made him long speeches, which possibly might be very fine, but were greatly beyond his comprehension; and that his letters were affected, formal, and pedantic' (WALDEGRAVE, Memoirs, p. 95). Urged by the Duke of Cumberland, who was desirous that a new administration should be formed before he set out for Hanover, where he was about to take the command of the electoral forces, the king at length struck the blow which he had for some time meditated. On 5 April 1757 Temple was dismissed from office, and on the following day Pitt shared the same late. The public discontent, which had subsided when Pitt had been called to power, now burst out again on his dismissal from office. The stocks fell. The court of common council voted the freedom of the city to Pitt and Legge for 'their loyal and disinterested conduct during their truly honourable though short administration, and for some weeks a shower of gold boxes and addresses descended upon Pitt from all parts of the country (Almon, Anecdotes, iii. 2-5).

Ultimately, after a ministerial interregnum of eleven weeks, the king found him-self obliged to acquiesce in Pitt's return. On 11 June Lord Mansfield was given full powers to open negotiations with Pitt and Newcastle. With the assistance of Lord Hardwicke as mediator, the alliance between the two statesmen was concluded, and on 29 June Pitt once more became secretary of state, with the supreme direction of the war and of foreign affairs. The Duke of Nowcastle returned to the treasury as the nomiof the civil and ecclesiastical patronage, and of that part of the secret-service money which was employed in bribing the members of the House of Commons. Lord Granville remained president of the council. Legge again became chancellor of the exchequer; Sir Robert Henley, afterwards Lord Northington, was appointed lord keeper of the great seal; Temple lord privy seal, George Grenville treasurer of the navy, and Fox paymaster-general of the forces. Pitt was anxious to represent the city of Bath, which Henley vacated on his promotion to the pecrage. As no new secretary of state had been 'appointed in his room, nor his commission revoked,' he was under no necessity to offer himself for re-election (PHILLIMORE, Memoirs of Lord Lyttelton, 1845, ii. 591). He therefore accepted the Chiltern Hundreds (Journals of the House of Commons, xxvii. 926), and at a by-election in July 1757 was roturned for Bath.

During the next four years Pitt's biography is to be found in the history of the world. Since 1756 England, allied with Prussia under Frederick the Great, had been arrayed in war against a combination of France, Austria, and the Empire, which was afterwards joined by Russia and Spain. The conflict was pursued in America and India, as well as in Europe. The struggle had opened disastrously for England. 'My lord,' Pitt had said to the Duke of Devonshire. 'I am sure I can save this country, and nobody else can' (WALPOLE, Memoirs of the Reign of George II, iii. 84). Upon being recalled to power, he immediately took steps to accomplish this task. Braving all charges of inconsistency, he brushed aside his old hatred of foreign subsidies and German alliances, and frankly declared that he would win America in Germany. With the opening of 1758 began a succession of victories all over the world which effectually justified the claim of Pitt to be the restorer of the greatness of Britain. 'We are forced to ask every morning,' said Horace Walpole in 1759, 'what victory there has been for fear of missing one.' Pitt himself planned the expeditions, and he raised loans for war expenses with a profusion that appalled more timid financiers. In 1760 no less than sixteen millions were voted. After the Duke of Cumberland's humiliating acceptance of the convention of Kloster Seven (10 Sept. 1757), which Pitt promptly disavowed, he raised another army for service in Germany, which, under Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, gained the decisive battle of Minden (1 Aug. 1759). In the meantime, in America, Louisnal head of the ministry, with the disposal | burg and Fort Duquesne were wrested from the French. In 1759 the French navy was resigned their respective offices. In the hope almost entirely destroyed in the decisive battles of Lagos and Quiberon. Wolfe's crowning victory at Quebec (13 Sept. 1759) destroyed the last remnant of French dominion in Canada. Clive's victory of Plassy (23 Jan. 1757) rendered the English masters of Bengal, while in January 1760 Sir Eyre Coote routed the last French army in the East Indies at Wandewash. Pitt's conduct of the war led to the culminating point of English power in the eighteenth century, and made England as much an object of jealousy and dread to all Europe as Spain and France had been formerly.

1245

At the close of the reign of George II, Pitt was in the zenith of his glory. 'Great Commoner,' as he was called, 'was the first Englishman of his time, and he had made England the first country in the world' (MACAULAY, Essays, ii. 198). His power over the House of Commons was complete. Divisions on party questions became unknown, and supplies were voted without discussion. The only political event which disturbed the placid current of domestic affairs was the resignation of Temple on 14 Nov. 1759, because he had been refused the Garter, but even he was induced to resume office two days afterwards.

On the accession of George III signs of an approaching change soon became apparent. The first royal speech to the council was composed by the king and Bute without any previous consultation with Pitt, and it was only after a long altercation that Pitt induced Bute to eliminate from it a covert censure upon the conduct of the war. In March 1761 Bute was appointed secretary of state in place of Holdernesse, and Legge was dismissed from the post of chancellor of the exchequer. At the general election in the same month Pitt was again returned for Bath. Bute and Pitt had been in political relations more than once during the late reign, but Pitt's refusal to screen Lord George Sackville [see GIRMAIN] had led to a coolness between them. Bute, anxious to rid himself of Pitt, at once took advantage of the jealousies which had begun to show themselves in the cabinet, in order to make his continuance in it impossible. Bute urged the necessity of an immediate peace. Pitt had no real desire for any peace which did not involve the complete humiliation of France. In September 1761, having become aware of the 'Family Compact,' he proposed to com-mence hostilities against Spain. To this his colleagues, after a discussion of the question in three successive cabinet councils, refused to concur, and on 5 Oct. Pitt and Temple in-law George Grenville [q. v.] (Parl. Hist.

of lessening his popularity, rewards were pressed on Pitt both by the king and Bute. Though Pitt refused to become either governor of Canada or chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, he accepted a pension of 3,000l. a year for three lives and the title of Baroness Chatham for his wife (Chatham Correspondence, ii. 146-58). A number of libels instantly appeared, in which he was accused of having sold his country. Finding that the cause of his resignation had been 'grossly misrepresented, Pitt wrote a letter to the town clerk of the city of London, explaining the real facts of the case (THACKERAY, Mistory of the Eurl of Chatham, 1827, i. 591-6), and on lord mayor's day he made a triumphal progress to the Guildhall, while Bute was hooted, and the king and queen were scarcely noticed.

On Pitt's retirement Bute became supreme in the ministry, although Newcastle remained its nominal head, and even he resigned in May 1762. The events which quickly followed, especially the declaration of war with Spain in January 1762, justifled Pitt's sagacity. Nevertheless he carefully abstained from any factious opposition during the first session of the new parliament. On 11 Dec. 1761 he supported a motion for the production of the Spanish papers, and was savagely attacked by Colonel Barré, to whom he deigned to make noreply (WALPOLE, Memoirs of the Reign of George III, 1894, i. 91-8). He also took part in the debate on the vote of credit in May following, when he pointed out the necessity of continuing the war in Germany, and of giving adequate support to the king of Portugal (ib. i. 128-31). Though suffering from a severe attack of gout, Pitt attended the house on 9 Dec. 1762, when he denounced the preliminary treaty with France and Spain, and maintained that the peace was both insecure and inadequate (Parl. Hist. xv. 1259-71). At the end of the speech, which lasted three hours and twenty-six minutes, and was delivered by him sitting and standing alternately, he was compelled, by the violence of the pain, to leave the house without taking part in the division. He declined to present the address of the Bath corporation congratulating the king on the 'adequate and advantageous peace,' and intimated to his friend Ralph Allen [q. v.] that he would never stand again for that city (THACKERAY, Hist. of the Earl of Chatham, ii. 23-7). In March 1763 he opposed Dashwood's obnoxious cider tax, and made a laughing-stock of his brotherav. 1307-8). Next month Bute resigned, and Grenville became prime minister with Lords Egremont and Halifax as his chief supporters.

On Lord Egremont's death in August 1763, the king, by Bute's advice, sent for Pitt, who insisted on the restoration of the great whig families. As the king refused to accede to these terms, the negotiation was broken off, and Grenville remained in power (HARRIS, Life of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, 1847, iii. 372-81; Grenville Papers, ii. 93-7, 192 et seq.) On 24 Nov. 1768 Pitt opposed the surrender of the privilege of parliament in Wilkes's case 'as highly dangerous to the freedom of parliament and an infringement on the rights of the people,' but at the same time expressed his thorough detestation of 'the whole series of "North Britons" (Parl. Hist. xv. 1363-4). On 17 Feb. 1764 he supported a motion condemning general warrants as illegal, and doclared that 'if the House negatived the motion they would be the disgrace of the present age and the reproach of posterity' (ib. xv. 1401-3). Towards the end of this year he became finally estranged from the Duke of Newcastle, to whom he never afterwards alluded but in terms of distrust and dislike.

At the beginning of 1765 Pitt's health became worse. He remained for several months in retirement at Hayes, and was absent from parliament during the whole of the session in which the Stamp Act was passed. In May 1765 the Duke of Cumberland made a fruitless visit to Hayes in order to induce him to take office. In the following month the duke had again recourse to him, but, after two interviews with the king, he declined to form a government without the concurrence of Temple (Chatham Correspondence, ii. 310-15). In July 1705 the Marquis of Rockingham succeeded Grenville as prime minister. On 14 Jan. 1766 Pitt, whose health had been partially restored by a visit to Bath, reappeared in the House of Commons. In a remarkable speech he declared that he could not give the Rockingham ministry his confidence, for 'confidence is a plant of slow growth in an aged bosom: youth is the season of credulity.' Though he asserted 'the authority of this kingdom over the colonies to be sovereign and supreme in every circumstance of government and legislation whatsoever,' he denied the right of the mother country to tax the colonies. and maintained that taxation was 'no part of the governing or legislative power.' In reply to the charge that he had given birth rejoiced that the colonists had resisted, and added: 'Three millions of people so dead to . all the feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves would have been fit instruments to make slaves of the rest.' He concluded his second speech by recommending that the Stamp Act should be repealed 'absolutely, totally, and immediately' (Parl. Hist. svi. 97-100, 101, 103-8). While objecting to the principle of the Declaratory Act in February 1766, Pitt zealously assisted the government in carrying the repeal of the Stamp Act. But he refused to listen to Rockingham's frequent solicitations to join his ministry, though they were agreed on most of the important questions of the day. His conduct in declining this opportunity of forming an honourable coalition with Rockingham is one of the most disastrous incidents of Pitt's political career; but it may well be doubted whether he would have acted as he did had he been in full possession of his health. His habits had been for some time becoming increasingly eccentric, and there can be little doubt that his mind was already in a morbid condition.

On Rockingham's dismissal in July 1766. Pitt, who had warmly avowed his sympathy with the king in his wish to destroy party government, was instructed to form a ministry. Temple proved intractable, and quarrelled with his brother-in-law. Grafton became first lord of the treasury, Northington lord president, Camden lord chancellor, Charles Townshend chancellor of the exchequer, and Shelburne and Conway secretaries of state. Pitt, whose infirmity rendered a constant attendance in the House of Commons impossible, took the sinecure office of lord privy seal (30.July 1766), and was raised to the peerage with the titles of Viscount Pitt of Burton-Pynsent in the county of Somerset and Earl of Chatham in the county of Kent (4 Aug.) Thus was formed the ill-assorted ministry afterwards described by Burke in his famous speech on American taxation as 'a tesselated payement without cement; here a bit of black stone, and there a bit of white; patriots and courtiers, king's friends and republicans; whigs and tories; treacherous friends and open enemies . . . a very curious show, but utterly unsafe to touch and unsure to stand on' ( 11'orks of Edmund Burke, 1815, ii. 420).

over the colonies to be sovereign and supreme in every circumstance of government and legislation whatsoever, he denied the right of the mother country to tax the colonies, and maintained that taxation was 'no part manded when it became known that he had of the governing or legislative power.' In the charge that he had given birth here is,' wrote Lord Chesterfield to his son, to sedition in America, he declared that he is that he has had a fall upstairs, and has be able to stand upon his legs again '(Letters and Works of the Earl of Chesterfield, 1845–1858, iv. 427). Chatham's many difficulties in managing his heterogeneous ministry were greatly increased by the despotic manner in which he treated his colleagues. Within four months all those members of the Rockingham administration who had been induced to remain in office resigned. To counterbalance these defections, Chatham made renewed overtures to the Bedford party (Chatham Correspondence, iii. 135), and, on their failure, the administration became more tory in character.

On entering office Chatham endeavoured to execute his long-cherished plan of making a great northern alliance against the house of Bourbon, but he soon found himself foiled in that direction by the selfish policy of Frederick the Great. He also formed schemes for transferring the power of the East India Company to the crown and for the better government of Ireland. In England one of the first things to engage his attention was the apprehended scarcity of corn. On 24 Sept. the celebrated order in council was issued which laid an embargo upon the exportation of grain. His maiden speech in the House of Lords on 11 Nov. 1766 was delivered in defence of this unconstitutional though necessary step. He is said to have spoken with 'coolness, dignity, and art' (WILPOLE, Memoirs of the Reign of George III, ii. 263). His speech, however, during the debate on the Indemnity Bill on 10 Dec. was less successful. He flouted the peers and involved himself in an altercation with the Duke of Both lords were required to Richmond. promise that the matter should go no further (Journals of the House of Lords, xxxi. 448), and 'from that day Lord Chatham, during the whole remainder of his administration, appeared no more in the House of Lords' (WAL-POLL, Memoirs of the Reign of George III, ii. 201).

Early in 1767 Chatham was absolutely incapacitated from all attention to business. From May 1767 to October 1768 he held no intercourse with the outside world. He refused interviews with his colleagues, and even declined a visit from the king. So much mystery was observed as to the nature of his malady that his friends were unable to fathom it, and his enemies declared that he was playing a part (see WALPOLD, Letters, v. 63, 131). Meantime Grafton assumed the duties of prime minister, the cabinet grew divided, and parliament unruly. The government was defeated on the annual vote for the land tax. Chatham's policy was overturned by done himself so much hurt that he will never his colleagues, and America was taxed by be able to stand upon his legs again (Letters Charles Townshead, the chancellor of the exchequer. The king, however, insisted on Chatham remaining in office, for though confined to your house, he wrote on 28 Jan. 1768, 'your name has been sufficient to enable my administration to proceed' (Chatham Correspondence, iii. 318). The privy seal was put in temporary commission on 2 Feb. 1708 for the purpose of hearing the arguments in the Warmley charter case, and was redelivered to Chatham at Hayes on the 21st of the following month. On 14 Oct. 1768 Chatham, in a letter written by his wife in the language of that abject respect which always marked his communications with the king, requested permission to resign (ih. iii. 343-4), and on the following day his sealwas delivered by Camden to the king, who received it with some show of reluctance.

A severe attack of gout at last relieved Chatham from the mental disease under which he had been suffering. In November 1768 he became reconciled to Temple and George Grenville (WALPOLE, Letters, v. 186). Some time, however, still clapsed before he resumed a pert in public affairs. In July 1769 he showed himself at a levée, and had a private interview with the king (Grenville Papers, iv. 426-7). At the opening of the session, on 9 Jan. 1770. Chatham reappeared in the house and made two vigorous speeches on the address. He boldly asserted that the liberty of the subject had been invaded, both at home and in the colonies; but, though he secured the adherence of Lord Camden, who openly denounced the Duke of Grafton's arbitrary measures, his amendment condemning the action of the House of Commons with regard to the Middlesex election was defeated by a large majority (Parl. Hist. xvi. 644, 646, 647-53, 656-65). On 22 Jan. Chatham, in a brilliant speech, seconded Rockingham's motion for a day to take into consideration the state of the nation. He asserted that the constitution had been 'grossly violated,' and declared that if the breach was effectually repaired the people would of themselves return to a state of tranquillity; if not, may discord prevail for ever!' In order to deliver the House of Commons from the corrupt influences of the rotten boroughs, he suggested that an additional member should be given to every county. At the close of his speech he announced that Lord Rockingham 'and his friends are now united with me and mine upon a principle which I trust will make our union indissoluble' (ib. xvi. 747-55). A week later Grafton resigned, and North became prime minister.

Chatham, who never had many personal adherents at any time in his career, appears to have discovered the mistake which he had hitherto made in repudiating the assistance of the whigs, and nothing more was heard of his former doctrine of the necessity of breaking up political parties. He and his new friends were, however, far from united in their policy, and frequent signs of dis-union appeared in their ranks. On 2 Feb. Chatham supported Rockingham's motion with reference to the proceedings against Wilkes, and condemned the conduct of the House of Commons in most severe terms (ib. xvi. 816-20). During the debate on Lord Craven's motion in favour of increasing the strength of the navy, Chatham complained strongly of 'the secret influence' behind the throne, owing to which, he asserted, there had been no 'original minister' since the accession of George III (ib. xvi. 841-2, 843; Walfold, Memoirs of the Reign of George III, iv. 62-3). On 14 March, while supporting a motion for the production of the civil list accounts, he declared that 'the late lord chancellor [Camden] was dismissed for giving his vote in this house.' At the instance of Lord Marchmont these words were taken down. Chatham, however, refused to retract them, and it was finally resolved that 'nothing has appeared to this House to justify that assertion' (Journals of the House of Lords, xxxii. 470; Parl. Hist. xvi. 819-50, 851-2). Chatham's bill for the reversal of the adjudications of the House of Commons against Wilkes was rejected by the House of Lords on 1 May (ib. xvi. 954-966). His motion censuring Lord North and his colleagues for the answer which they had advised the king to give to the remonstrance from the City, as well as his motion for a dissolution of purliament, met with the same want of success (ib. xvi. 966-74, 978-9). On 1 June the thanks of the common council of London were prosented to Chatham for the zeal which he had shown in the support of those most valuable and sacred privileges, the right of clection and the right of petition, &c. (THACKDRAY, History of the Earl of Chatham, ii. 193-5). On 22 Nov. he supported, in a specch of great power, the Duke of Richmond's motion for the production of the papers relating to the seizure of the Falkland Islands. He charged the ministers 'with having destroyed all content and unanimity at home by a series of oppressive, unconsti-tutional measures, and with having betrayed and delivered up the nation defenceless to a foreign enemy; and insisted in the strongest terms on the necessity of impressing seamen, declaring that 'the first great and acknowledged object of national defence in this country is to maintain such a superior naval force at home that even the united fleets of France and Spain may never be masters of the Channel' (Parl. Hist. xvi. 1091-1108). He attacked Lord Chief-justice Mansfield more than once during the session for his direction to the jury in the case of Woodfall, the publisher of the 'Letters of Junius' (ib. xvi. 1302, 1305-6, 1313-1317). On 30 April 1771 he supported the Duke of Richmond's attempt to expunge the resolution of the House of Lords of 2 Feb. 1770 relating to the Middlesex election, but failed to clicit any reply from the ministers (ib. xvii. 216-219). On the following day he unsuccessfully moved for an address to the king to dissolve parliament, and declared himself a convert to triennial parliaments.

During the next three years Chatham's health was so infirm that he was rarely able to attend the House of Lords. On 19 May 1772 he spoke warmly in favour of the bill for the rolles of protestant dissenters, and made a violent attack upon the bishops (ib. xvii. 400-1; see WALPOLE, Journal of the Reign of George III, 1859, i. 95-6). But his energies were now mainly directed towards forcing on the government a pacific solution of their difficulties with the American colonies. On 26 May 1774 he reappeared in the house, and implored the ministers 'to adopt a more gentle mode of governing America,' while he reasserted that 'this country had no right under heaven' to tax the colonists (Parl. Hist. xvii. 1853-6). In the following month he opposed the Quebec Government Bill, which established a legislative council, but confirmed the French laws. Pitt declared that 'the whole of the bill appeared to him destructive of that liberty which ought to be the groundwork of every constitution' (ib. xvii. 1402-4; WALPOLE, Journal of the Reign of George III, i. 374). On 20 Jan. 1775 he proposed an address to the king requesting him to recall the troops from Boston, 'in order to open the ways towards an happy settlement of the dangerous troubles in America.' In an eloquent speech he told the ministers that they would be 'forced to a disgraceful abandonment of their present measures and principles, which they avow, but cannot defend. He fully justified the resistance of the colonists, and reminded the house that 'it is not repealing this act of parliament—it is not repealing a piece of parchment that can restore America to our bosom; you must repeal her fears and her resentments, and you may then hope for her love and gratitude' (Parl. Hist. xviii.

149-60, 165-6). He was supported by Shel-, burne, Camden, Rockingham, and Richmond, but the motion was defeated by sixtyeight votes to eighteen. After a conference with Franklin, Chatham, on 1 Feb. 1775, introduced a bill for settling the troubles in America,' the purport of which was to declare the supremacy of this country over the colonies in all cases except taxation; to annul the various obnoxious acts which had been passed; and to authorise the meeting of a general congress at Philadelphia, at which the colonists should acknowledge the restricted supremacy, and make a free grant to the king of a certain perpetual revenue, subject to the disposition of the British par-liament (ib. xviii. 198-204, 209, 210-11). The bill was rejected, and was subsequently printed and circulated by Chatham as an appeal to the judgment of the public from that of the House of Lords.

During the greater part of this year and throughout 1776 an illness, apparently similar to that which had befallen him during his last administration, prevented Ohatham from attending parliament. Though in a state of great weakness, he went down to the house on 30 May 1777, and unsuccessfully moved an address to the crown for the stoppage of hostilities in America. 'You may ravage, he said; 'you cannot conquer. It is impossible. You cannot conquer the Americans. . . I might as well talk of driving them before me with this crutch.' He insisted on the immediate redress of all the American grievances. 'This,' he said, 'will be the herald of peace; this will open the way for treaty; ' and added: 'Should you conquer this people, you conquer under the cannon of France; under a masked battery then ready to open. The moment a treaty with Franco appears, you must declare war, though you had only five ships of the line in England' (THACKERAY, Hist. of the Earl of Chatham, ii. 311-14, 319-20). According to the testimony of his son, William Pitt, Chatham replied to Lord Weymouth during this debate 'in a flow of eloquence, and with a beauty of expression, animated and striking beyond conception' (Chatham Correspondence, iv. 438). In the following summer Chatham fell from his horse in a fit, while riding in the vicinity of Hayes.

He made two brilliant speeches during the debate on the address at the opening of parliament in November 1777, and vehemently denounced the employment of savages against the Americans. In his spirited reply to the Earl of Suffolk, which appeared to the Duke of Grafton 'to surpass all that we have ever heard of the celebrated orators of Greece or Rome,' he made a famous appeal to the tapestry hangings of the House of Lords. In an amendment to the address he recommended the immediate cessation of hostilities, but was once more defeated (Parl. Hist. xix. 360-75, 409-10, 411). On 2 Dec. he supported Richmond's motion for an inquiry into the state of the nation, and pointed out the defenceless state of Gibraltar and Port Mahon (ib. xix. 474-8). On 5 Dec. he moved for the instructions to General Burgoyne, and again recommended the withdrawal of the troops from America, though he still declared himself 'an avowed enemy to American independency ' (ib. xix. 485-91). Both this motion and another which he moved, with reference to the employment of Indians against the Americans, were defeated by forty votes to nineteen (ib. xix. 507-8, 509, 510, 512). On 11 Dec. he protested against the adjournment of the house at a time 'when the affairs of this country present on every side prospects full of awe, terror, and impending danger (ib. xix. 597-602), and was indecently told by Suffolk that he only wanted the house to sit because he would be allowed to give his advice nowhere else' (WALFOLE, Journal of the Reign of George III, ii. 178). In Jan. 1778 written explanations passed between Chatham and Rockingham with regard to their different views on the policy to be pursued towards the revolted colonies. Rockingham was anxious to acknowledge at once the independence of America, while Chatham, in spite of the gloomy outlook of affairs, persisted in his opposition to that course (Chatham Correspondence, iv. 489-92). Early in the same year Chatham's physician, Dr. Addington, and Sir James Wright, afriend of Lord Bute, engaged in an ineffectual attempt to bring about a political alliance between the two statesmen, and their gossiping interviews gave rise to a considerable controversy after Chatham's death (see THACK-DRAY, History of the Earl of Chatham, vol. ii. app. pp. 362-9, 633-57). Though the only hope of retaining the friendship of America and of baffling the efforts of France and Spain lay in Chatham's return to power, the king refused to hold any direct communication with him. In March 1778 North made a futile attempt to induce him to join the government, on the understanding that he should support 'the fundamentals of the present administration' (Correspondence of George III with Lord North, 1867, ii. 149). But Shelburne, who represented Chatham in this negotiation, assured North's envoy that Chatham would not accept office unless an entirely new government were formed (Loro EDMOND FITZMAURICH, Life of William, Earl of Shelburne, 1875-6, iii. 20-5). On 7 April the Duke of Richmond, who had formerly supported Chatham's American policy, but now openly advocated the immediate acknowledgment of American independence, moved an address to the crown for the withdrawal of the forces from the revolted colonies. Against the advice of his physician, Chatham insisted on being present at the debate, in order that he might publicly declare his disagreement with the American policy of the Rockingham party. Wrapped up in flannel, and supported on crutches, he was led into the house by his son William, and his son-in-law, Lord Mahon. In a few broken words, uttered in a barely audible voice, he protested for the last time against 'the dismemberment of this ancient and most noble monarchy,' and laughed to scorn the fears of a French invasion. While rising to speak a second time in reply to the Duke of Richmond, Chatham fell backwards in a fit. He was carried into the Prince's Chamber, and the debate was immediately adjourned (Parl. Hist. xix. 1012-31). As soon as he could be moved he was carried into a messenger's house in Downing Street, where he remained a few days. Having recovered in some degree from the attack, he was removed to Hayes. There, after lingering a few weeks, he died on 11 May 1778, in his seventieth On the same day an address was carried unanimously in the House of Commons, praying the king to give directions that the remains of William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, be interred at the public charge, and that a monument be erected in the collegiate church of St. Peter's, Westminster, to the memory of that excellent statesman, with an inscription expressive of the public sense of so great and irreparable a loss ' (ib. xix, 1224-5). Shelburne's motion that the House of Lords should attend the funeral was deteated by a single vote (ib. xix. 1233-1234). A sum of 20,000% was voted by the House of Commons on 26 May in payment of Chatham's debts, and a bill settling an annuity of 4,000% on his successors in the earldom received the royal assent on 3 June (ib. xix. 1225-8, 1233, 1234-55). The city of London presented a petition to the House of Commons requesting that Chatham might be buried in St. Paul's Oathedral (ib. xix. 1229-38): but the preparations for the funeral in the abbey had already been made, and the ministers were disinclined to grant any favours to the city. The body lay in state in the Painted Chamber on 7 and 8 June, and was buried in the north transept of Westminster Abbey on the following day. The funeral was attended chiefly by members of the opposition. The banner of the lordship of Chatham was borne by Barré, accompanned by the Dukes of Richmond, Manchester, and Northumberland, and the Marquis of Rockingham. The pall was upheld by Burke, Dunning, Sir George Savile, and Thomas Townshend. In the absence of the eldest son on foreign service, William Pitt was the chief mourner, while Lords Shelburne, Camden, and six other peers followed as assistant mourners.

4 Ţ

Chatham was pre-eminently the most striking figure on the English political stage during the eighteenth century. By force of his own abilities and his extraordinary popularity he became the foremost man in the nation, notwithstanding the prejudice entertained against him by George II. 'In him, says Mr. Lecky, 'the people for the first time felt their power. He was essentially their representative, and he gloried in avowing it (History of England in the Eighteenth Century, 1883, ii. 516). Ambition was the ruling passion of his life, but it was ambition associated with worthy objects-the reputation of his country abroad, the integrity of her free institutions at home' (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Life of William, Earl of Shelburne, iii. 83) In spite of his many foibles and weaknesses, Chatham was undoubtedly a man of consummate genius. His mind was singularly fertile in resources. The vice of irresolution was unknown to him, His courage was indomitable, his energy irresistible. 'Il faut avouer,' said Frederick the Great, 'que l'Angleterre a été longtems en travail, et qu'elle a beaucoup soufferte pour produire M. Pitt; mais enfin elle est accouchée d'un homme (Chatham Correspondence, i. 444-5). As a war minister, his greatness is beyond question. Though his military plans were often faulty, and sometimes unsuccessful, he revived the spirit of the nation, and inspired all those who worked under him with his own undaunted courage. Regardless of the traditions of the services, he chose men as commanders of his expeditions for their merit, and not for their rank. It was his discernment that selected Wolfe for the command of the expedition to Quebec. 'I am no more an enthusiast to his memory than you, wrote Horace Walpole of Chatham to his friend Cole. 'I knew his faults and his defects; yet . . . under him we attained not only our highest elevation, but the most solid authority in Europe. When the names of Marlborough and Chatham are still pronounced with awe in France, our little cavils make a he mistaken' (Letters, vii. 76-7). On the other hand, it must be said that Chatham was too fond of war, and was indifferent alike to the misery it caused and the cost which it entailed.

Though Chatham's character is absolutely free from suspicion of corruption, no statesman ever exhibited greater inconsistencies during his political career. Pride rather than principle seems to have actuated his conduct on more than one occasion. He consulted no judgment but his own. His haughtiness to his colleagues was only equalled by his abject servility to the king. His vanity was ex-cessive, and he delighted in pomp and osten-tation. He was always playing a part: 'he was an actor in the closet, an actor at council, an actor in parliament; and even in private society he could not lay aside his theatrical tones and attitudes' (MACAULAY, Essays, 1852, ii. 148).

Owing to the absence of any regular and full reports of the parliamentary debates, only a few fragments of Chatham's actual speeches have been preserved—by Hugh Boyd [q. v.] Sir Philip Francis [q. v.], and others. fame, therefore, as an orator rests almost entirely upon the evidence of contemporary writers as to the effects produced by his eloquence. All contemporary accounts concur in describing these effects to have been unparalleled, and, judged by this test, he must be ranked with the greatest orators of ancient or modern times. He spoke generally without premeditation, and his few prepared speeches appear to have been failures. His merit was chiefly rhetorical. He was neither witty nor pathetic. Little sustained or close argument figured in his speeches. He delighted in touching the moral chords, in appealing to strong passions, and in arguing questions on high grounds of principle rather than on grounds of detail '(Lnoxx, Hist. of England in the Eighteenth Century, ii. 469). His invective and sarcasm were simply terrific. In grace and dignity of gesture he was not inferior to Garrick. He possessed, moreover, every personal advantage that an orator could desire. His voice was both full and clear; his lowest whisper was distinctly heard; his middle tones were sweet, rich, and beautifully varied; when he elevated his voice to its highest pitch, the house was completely filled with the volume of sound' (Butler, Reminiscences, 1824, i. 189-In the House of Commons his eloquence overbore both criticism and opposition; friends and foes alike listened in breathless silence to the words which fell puny sound. Nations that are beaten cannot sphere of the House of Lords he was less successful; his impassioned style of oratory proved unsuitable for so small and frigid an assembly.

Chatham knew nothing of financial or commercial matters. He never applied himself steadily to any branch of knowledge, and was not even familiar with the rules of the House of Commons. He appears to have confined his reading to a small number of books, and, according to his sister, 'knew nothing accurately except Sponser's "Fairy Queen" (MAGAULAY Research :: KIP Queen" (MAGAULAY, Essays, iii. 547). Demosthenes, Bolingbroke, and Barrow seem to have been his favourite authors in the matter of style, and he is said to have read the contents of Bailey's 'Dictionary' twice through from beginning to end. Like Lord Granville, he was unable to write a common letter well, and Wilkes has called him with some truth 'the best orator and the worst letter-writer' of the age (Correspondence of John Wilkes, 1805, ii. 127) In private life his conduct was exemplary: 'it was stained by no vices nor sullied by any meanness' Letters and Works of the Earl of Chesterfield, ii. 468).

Chatham's figure was tall and imposing, with the eyes of a hawk, a little head, a thin face, and a long aquiline nose. He was scrupulously exact in his dress, and was never seen on business without a full-dress coat and tie-wig. His deportment in society was extremely dignified, and he 'preserved all the manners of the vieille cour, with a degree of podantry, however, in his conversation, especially when he affected levity' (LORD EDMOND FITZMAURION, Life of William, Earl of Shelburne, i. 76).

Monuments to Chatham, executed by John Bacon (1740-1799) [q.v.], were erected in Westminster Abbey and (with an inscription by Burke) in the Guildhall. The marble urn, with a medallion of Ohatham by the same sculptor, placed by Lady Chatham in the grounds at Burton-Pynsent, was subsequently removed to Stowe, and is now in the garden of Revesby Abbey, Lincolnshire. There is a statue of Chatham by MacDowell in St. Stephen's Hall, Westminster. Statues were also crected in New York and in harlestown in acknowledgment of his services in promoting the repeal of the Stamp Act (888 Magazine of American History, vii. 67, viii. 214-20). A portrait of Chatham, by Richard Brompton, at Chevening, was presented by Chatham in 1772 to Philip, second earl Stanhope. A replica is in the National Portrait Gallery. It has been engraved by J. K. Sherwin and Edward Fisher. from his lips. In the uncongenial atmo- | Another portrait, by William Hoare, belongs to Viscount Cobham. There are engravings of this portrait by Richard Houston, Edward Fisher, and others. The picture in the National Gallery, strangely misnamed 'The Death of the Earl of Chatham [in the House of Lords],' was painted by Copley in 1779-80. It was engraved under the direction of Bartolozzi by J. M. Delatre in 1820. References to a number of caricatures of Chatham will be found in the 'Catalogue of Prints and Drawings in the British Museum: Political and Personal Satires' (vol. iii. pt. ii. pp. 1205-6, vol. iv. pp. lxxxii-iv). The original Blackfriars Bridge, designed by Robert Mylne, when first opened in 1769, was called 'Pitt Bridge' by order of the common council, but the name was soon afterwards dropped. The city approach to the bridge, also named after him, 'Chatham Square is now absorbed in New Bridge Street and the Thames Embankment. Fort Duquesne was renamed Fort Pitt, and subsequently Pittsburg, in his honour.

According to Lord Chesterfield, Chatham had 'a most happy turn to poetry, but he seldom indulged and seldomer avowed it' (OHESTERFIELD, Letters and Works, ii. 468). Some Latin verses written by Chatham on the death of George I were published in Pietas Universitatis Oxoniensis in obitum serenissimi Regis Georgii I,' &c., Oxford, 1727, fol. These and some English verses addressed by Chatham to Temple and Garrick respectively are printed in Thackeray's 'History' (i. 4, 5, 172-3, ii. 250-1). Chatham published nothing himself, though more than one pamphlet has been erroneously The authorship of the ascribed to him. 'Letters of Junius' has also been attributed to Chatham, but on absurdly insufficient grounds. The connection of Francis and Junius with the reports of Chatham's speeches is the subject of an article by Mr. Leslie Stephen in the third volume of the 'English Historical Review' (pp. 233-49). Chatham's letters 'to his nephew, Thomas Pitt, esq. (afterwards Lord Camelford), then at Cambridge, London, 1804, 8vo, were edited by William Wyndham Grenville, baron Grenville [q. v.], and have passed through several editions. His 'Correspondence' was edited by Messrs. W. S. Taylor and J. H. Pringle, the executors of the second Earl of Chatham, and 'published from the original manuscripts in their possession, London, 1888-40, 8vo, 4 vols. A large number of Chatham's despatches and letters will be found in the Record Office and at the British Museum (see indices to the Addit. MSS. 1783-1885, 1854-75, 1876-81, 1882-7, 1888-93). Others belong to Lord Cobham (see Hist. MSS.

Comm. 2nd Rep. App. p. 88), the Marquis of Lansdowne (ib. 3rd Rep. App. pp. 130-1, 135, 142, 146, 6th Rep. App. p. 241), Lord Leconfield (ib. 6th Rep. App. p. 315), and the Duke of Leeds (ib. 11th Rep. App. pi, 45) of Leeds (ib. 11th Rep. App. vii. 45). He married, on 16 Nov. 1754, Hester, only daughter of Richard Grenville of Wotton Hall, Buckinghamshire, and Hester, countess Temple. His wife's brothers, Richard (afterwards Richard, earl Temple) and George, with her first cousin, George Lyttelton, and her husband, formed the famous 'Cobham cousinhood.' The marriage was a singularly happy one. They had three sons—viz.: (1) John [q. v.], who succeeded as second Earl of Chatham; (2) William (1759-1806) [q. v.], the famous statesman; and (3) James Charles, born on 24 April 1761, who entered the royal navy, became captain of H.M.'s sloop Hornet, and died off Barbados in 1781 -and two daughters, viz.: (1) Hester, born on 18 Oct. 1755, who married, on 19 Dec. 1774, Charles, lord Mahon (afterwards third Earl Stanhope), and died at Chevening, Kent, on 18 July 1780, leaving three daughters, the eldest of whom was the well-known and eccentric Lady Hester Lucy Stanhope [q.v.]; and (2) Harriet, born on 18 April 1758, who married, on 28 Sept. 1785, the Hon. Edward James Eliot, remembrancer of the exchequer, second son of Edward, second baron Eliot of St. Germans, and died on 24 Sept. 1786. leaving an only daughter, Harriet Hester, who became the wife of Lieutenant-general Sir William Henry Pringle, G.C.B. Chatham's widow died at Burton-Pynsent, Somerset, on 3 April 1803, aged 82, when the barony of Chatham, bestowed on her on 4 Dec. 1761, devolved on her eldest son, John, second earl of Chatham. She was buried in Westminster Abbey on 16 April 1803.

For some years previously to his marriage Chatham resided at South Lodge, Enfield, He purchased Hayes Place, Middlesex. near Bromley in Kent, soon after his marriage. He rebuilt the house, and by subsequent purchases extended the grounds to about a hundred acres. Here he indulged in his favourite pursuit of landscape-gardening, sometimes even 'planting by torchlight, as his peremptory and impatient temper could brook no delay' (WALPOLE, Memoirs of the Reign of George III, iii. 80). From 1759 to 1761 Chatham lived in the house (now numbered 10) in St. James's Square which was occupied by Mr. Gladstone in the parliamentary session of 1890. On resigning office in October 1761 Chatham gave up his town house in St. James's Square, and resolved to live entirely at Hayes. Sir William Pynsent, an eccentric Somersetshire baronet, who died on 12 Jan. 1765, left his estate at Burton-Pynsent in the parish of Curry-Rivell, and nearly 3,000% a year, to Chatham, with whom he was personally unacquainted. The validity of the will was unsuccessfully disputed by the Rev. Sir Robert Pynsent, a cousin of the testator. Chatham erected a column (commonly known as the Burton steeple) in memory of his benefactor. A portion of the old mansion-house is still standing. On the death of Chatham's widow the estate passed by sale to the Pinney family. When Chatham came into possession of Burton-Pynsent, he sold Hayes to the Hon. Thomas Walpole. But on falling ill he became possessed with a morbid belief that only the air of Hayes would restore his health, and Walpole was persuaded to sell it back to him (ib. iii. $0-3; Chatham Correspondence, iii. 289-92). Chatham returned to Hayes in December 1767, and it continued his favourite residence for the rest of his life. Hayes Place was sold in 1785 to Mr. (afterwards Sir) James Bond, and by him, in 1789, to George, viscount Lewisham (afterwards third Earl of Dartmouth). It is now the residence of Mr. Everard Alexander Hambro. In the chancel of Hayes church, adjoining the grounds, are hung the banners which were borne at Chatham's funeral in West-Chatham occupied North minster Abbey. End House, Hampstead, in 1766, and during part of his mysterious illness in 1767. house, which is now called Wildwood House, has undergone considerable alterations; but Chatham's room, concerning which Howitt relates some very curious particulars, still remains (Northern Heights of London, 1869, p. 82).

[Though much information as to Chatham's career can be gleaned from Francis Thackeray's ponderous History of the Earl of Chatham (2 vols. 4to, London, 1827), from Macaulay's Essays, the Chatham Correspondence, Almon's Anecdotes, and Timbs's Anecdote Biography, 1862, the first full life of Chatham was by Albert von Ruville (Berlin 1905, 3 vols., English transl. 1907, 3 vols.) See also Authentic Memoirs of the Right Hon. the late Earl of Chatham, 1778; Godwin's History of the Life of William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, 1783; the Speeches of the Right Hon. the Earl of Chatham, with a Biographical Memoir, 1848; Pitt's Correspondence with Colonial Governors in America, ed. Kimball (New York, 1906, 2 vols.); Coxe's Memoirs of Horatio, Lord Walcole, 1802; Memoirs by a celebrated Literar Character, 1814; John Nichols's Recollections and Reflections, 1822; Phillimore's Memoirs and Correspondence of George, Lord Lyttelton, 1845; Albemarle's Memoirs of the Marquis of Rockingham, 1852; Ballantyne's Lord Carteret, 1887; Carlyle's Frederick the Great, 1872-3; Boswell's Life of Johnson, 1887; Lady Chatterton's Memorials of Admiral Lord Gambier, 1861, vol. i; Russell's Life and Times of C. J. Fox, 1859, vol. i.; Mahon's History of England, 1858, vols. ii.-vii.; Bancroft's History of the United States of America, 1876, vols. iii. iv. vi.; Jesse's Memoirs of the Life and Reign of King George III, 1867; Woodfall's Junius, 1814; Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, 1812–15; Seward's Literary Anecdotes of Distinguished Persons, 1814, ii. 318, 353, 357-86; Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Benjamin Franklin, 1818, i. 305-7, 490-504, 508; Brougham's Historical Sketches of Statesmen, 1839, 1st ser. pp. 17-47; Grattan's Miscellaneous Works, 1822, pp. 9-10; Rogers's Complete Collection of the Protests of the House of Lords, 1875, ii. 101-17; Lodge's Portraits, 1849-50, vii. 289-304; Earle's English Premiers, 1871, i. 129-217; Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, 1806, iv. 869-78; Whateley's Observations on Gardening, 1801, pp. 72, 85 n.; Thoms's Hannah Lightfoot, &c., 1867; Retrospective Review, vii. 352-78; North American Review, lv. 377-425; Edinburgh Review, lxx. 90-123; Dublin Univ. Mag. xl. 1-18; Collinson's History of Somerset, 1791, vol. i, Hundred of Abdick and Bulston, pp. 24-5; Thorne's Environs of London, 1876, i. 188, 289, 334, 696; Wheatley's London Past and Present, 1891, i. 367, 520, ii. 137, 161, 170, 242, 281, 301, iii. 4, 463, 472, 479; Chester's Westminster Abbey Registers (Harl. Soc. Publ.), 1875, pp. 426, 442, 469; Collins's Peerage of England, 1812, v. 47-73; Doyle's Official Baronage, 1886, i. 369-60; G. E. Ö.'s Complete Peerage, 1889, ii. 212-13; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886, iii. 1121; London Gazettes, 1746, 1766, 1778; Hist. MSS, Comm. 1st Rep. App. pp. 56-7, 8th Rep. App. i. 196, 219-26, 9th Rep. App. iii. 12th Rep. App. ix. 254-6, 13th Rep. App. iii. 38, 66, 73, 74, 76-7, 81, 14th Rep. App. i. 10-13; Official Return of Lists of Members of Parliament, ii. 80, 93, 106, 109, 111, 115, 119, 129; Notes and Queries, passim; Brit. Mus. Cat.; Frederic Harrison's monograph in Twelve English Statesmen, 1905.] G. F. R. B.

PITT, WILLIAM (1759-1806), statesman, second son of William Pitt, first earl of Chatham [q. v.], and Hester, daughter of Richard Grenville, was born at Hayes, near Bromley, Kent, on 28 May 1759. As a child he was precocious and eager, and at seven years old looked forward to following in his father's steps (Chatham Correspondence, ii. 393-4). His health being extremely delicate, he was educated at home. His father took much interest in his studies, preparing him to excel as an orator by setting him to translate verbally, and at sight, passages from Greek and Latin authors, and hearing him recite. When thirteen years old he composed a tragedy-'Laurentino, King of Chersonese' -which he and his brothers and sisters acted at his father's house. It is extant in manuscript. The plot is political, and there is no love in it (MACAULAY, Miscellaneous Writings, p. 396). At fourteen, when he knew more than most lads of eighteen, he matriculated at Cambridge, entering Pembroke Hall in the spring of 1773, and going into residence the following October. He was put under the care of the Rev. George Pretyman, afterwards Tomline [q. v.], one of the tutors. Soon afterwards a serious illness compelled his return home, and he remained there until the next July. Dr. Anthony Addington [q. v.] recommended a copious use of portwine. The remedy was successful, and at eighteen his health was established. For two years and a half he lived at Cambridge, with little or no society save that of his tutor, Pretyman. He studied Latin and Greek diligently, and showed a taste for mathematics; but of modern literature he read little, and of modern languages knew only French. In the spring of 1776 he graduated M.A. without examination, and towards the end of the year began to mix with other young men. He was excellent company, cheerful, witty, and well-bred. While still residing at Cambridge, he often went to hear debates in parliament, and on one of these occasions was introduced to Charles James Fox [q. v.], who was struck by his eager comments on the arguments of the different speakers (STANHOPE, Life, i. 27). He was present at his father's last speech in the House of Lords on 7 April 1778, and helped to carry the earl from the chamber. On his father's death he was left with an income of less than 300% a year, and, intending to practise law, began to keep terms at Lincoln's Inn, though he lived for the most part at Cambridge. In the following October he published an answer to a letter from Lord Mountstuart with reference to his father's political conduct (Ann. Reg. 1778, xxi. 257-61). He was called to the bar on 12 June 1780, and in August went the western circuit. At the general election in September he stood for the university of Cambridge, and was at the bottom of the poll. Sir James Lowther, however, caused him to be elected at Appleby, and he took his seat on 28 Jan. 1781. Among his closest friends were Edward Eliot (afterwards his brother-in-law), Richard Pepper Arden (afterwards lord Alvanley), and Wilberforce. In their company he was always full of life and gaiety. At first he gambled a little, but gave it up on finding that the excitement was absorbing; for he resolved to allow nothing to hinder him from giving his whole mind to the service of his country.

On entering parliament Pitt joined himself to Lord Shelburne, then head of the party that had followed his father Chatham, He was thus in opposition to Lord North's administration. He made his first speech on 26 Feb. in support of Burke's bill for economical reform. The house expected much of Chatham's son, and was not disappointed. Perfectly at his ease, and in a voice full of melody and force, he set forth his opinions in well-ordered succession and in the best possible words (Parl. Hist. xxi. 1261). Burke's praise was unmeasured ; Fox warmly congratulated him; and North declared his speech 'the best first speech that he had ever heard' (STANHOPD, i. 56, 58; Life of Wilberforce, i. 22). On 12 June he spoke in support of Fox's motion for peace with the American colonies. After expounding Chatham's principles, which had been impugned in the debate, he insisted on the injustice of the war and the miseries it had produced (Parl. Hist. xxii. 480). In the summer he again went circuit, had a little business, and impressed his fellow-barristers by his genial humour (STANHOPE, i. 63). In the debate on the address, on 28 Nov., after the disaster at York Town, he scornfully denounced the speech from the throne in an energetic speech, which was loudly applauded (Parl. Hist. xxii, 735). During the early part of 1782 he was prominent in opposition to the government, and on 8 March, when North's ministry was obviously tottering, declared that were it possible for him to expect to enter a new administration he' would never accept a subordinate situation.' Though the words probably fell from him accidentally in the excitement of speaking (Memoirs of Rockingham, ii. 423), they expressed a settled intention (TOMLIND, i. 67). When, a few days later, Rockingham was forming an administration, Pitt was offered some minor offices, among them that of vice-treasurer of Ireland, which, though of small importance politically, was worth about 5,000% a year and had been held by his father. Poor as he was, he refused it (Life of Shelburne, iii. 136). While giving the government an independent support, he was consequently not involved in its difficulties. Following in his father ssteps, he moved on 7 May for a select committee on the state of the representation. He inveighed against the corrupt influence of the crown, declared that it was maintained by the system of close boroughs, and referred to his father's opinion that reform was necessary for the preservation of liberty. He did not, however, bring forward any definite plan. His motion was defeated by 161 to 141 (Parl. Hist. xxii. 1416). On the 17th he supported a motion for shortening the duration of parliaments, and on 19 June a bill for checking bribery On Rockingham's death Pitt reaped the fruit of his refusal of subordinate office. Shelburne became prime minister; Fox and Burke thereupon resigned, and Shelburne, almost without allies in the commons, turned to Pitt. On 6 July, at the age of twentythree, he became chancellor of the exchequer. Differing from Shelburne on the peace with the Americans, he at once insisted that the preliminaries implied a recognition of independence that was irrevocable in the case of the failure of the final treaty. The king in vain urged that he should retract his words, declaring that, as a young man, he could do so honourably (Life of Shelburne, p. 809). The ministry needed further support. Neither Shelburne nor Pitt would consent to a union with North. Both were, however, willing to receive Charles James Fox, and on 11 Feb. 1783 Pitt, at Shelburne's request, invited him to join the ministry. Fox refused unless Shelburne ceased to be prime minister, and Pitt is said to have broken off the interview with the words, 'I did not come here to betray Lord Shelburne.' From this interview is to be dated the political hostility between Pitt and Fox (ib. p. 842; Court and Cabinets, i. 149; TOMLINE, i. 89). While the coalition between Fox and North was being formed, Pitt, on the 17th, upheld the government in a speech below his usual standard. He taunted Sheridan with his dramatic work, and Sheridan replied by comparing him with the Angry Boy in Jonson's 'Alchemist.' On the 21st, however, he spoke against the coalition for two hours and threequarters with unequalled power. one of his most successful efforts, and North in reply referred to his 'amazing eloquence' (Speeches, i. 50 sq.; Malmisbury, ii. 35). On the 28rd Shelburne resigned. Pitt, although he had loyally supported him, disliked him heartily. Next day the king offered Pitt the treasury. Shelburne and his friend Dundas urged him to accept, and the king was importunate. He hesitated, but finally (25 March) declined the offer, for he considered that North's support was essential to success, and that it would be prejudicial to his honour as well as precarious to depend on North. The king expressed himself 'much hurt' (Stanhoff, vol. i. App. pp. i-iii; Court and Cabinets, i. 209). On the 31st he announced his resignation, broke off all political connection with Shelburne, and declared that he was 'unconnected with any party whatever,' and should act independently (Memorials of Fox, i. 326). On 2 April the coalition ministry, with the Duke of Portland as premier, took office. On 7 May Pitt again brought forward the question of reform of parliament, this time in resolutions embodying a definite plan for (1) checking bribery at elections; (2) disfranchising corrupt constituencies; (3) adding to the number of knights of the shire and members for London. His resolutions were lost by 293 to 149 (Parl. Hist. xxiii. 827-75). Another bill that he brought forward on 2 June, for reforming abuses in public offices, passed the commons, but was rejected by the lords.

On 12 Sept. 1783 he went with Wilberforce and Eliot to France, the only visit that he made to the continent. He stayed some time at Rheims, wherehe met Talleyrand, and on 9 Oct. went to Paris and Fontainebleau, where 'men and women crowded round him in shoals.' It is said, but probably falsely, that Necker proposed that Pitt should marry his daughter, afterwards Madame de Stael. He returned home on 24 Oct., and took up his residence in his brother's house in Berkeley Square, intending to resume his legal work, for even his friends thought that the formation of the coalition had 'extinguished him nearly for life as a politician' (Rosu, Diary, i. 45). The coalition administration, however, soon came to an end over Fox's India bill [see under Fox, CHARLES JAMES], which Pitt opposed in terms of scarcely justiflable vehemence (Parl. Hist. xxiii. 1279). It passed the commons by majorities of more than two to one, but the king authorised Earl Temple to state in the lords that he should regard any one as his enemy who voted for the bill; and on 17 Dec. the lords rejected it by 95 votes to 76. On the same day a resolution was moved in the commons condemning in general terms the action of Earl Temple. Pitt declared the resolution 'frivolous and ill-timed.' Fox, in reply, taunted him with his youth and inexperience, and with following 'the headlong course of ambition.' The resolution was carried by 158 to 80. On 19 Dec. the king dismissed the ministers and appointed Pitt first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. He had become prime minister before he was twenty-five.

The announcement of his acceptance of office was received in the commons with derisive laughter. There was a strong majority in favour of the late ministers, including, with the exception of Pitt himself and Dundas, every debater of eminence in the house (ROSIBERY, p. 58), while the circumstances under which the coalition had fallen added to the bitterness of the opposition. Pitt did not find it easy to form an administration, and when his cousin Temple retracted on 21 Dec. his acceptance of the seals of a secretary of state, he was 'led almost to despair' (Rose, i. 50). By the 23rd he had hastily patched together an administration composed of men wholly inadequate to the work before them' (Bland Burges Papers, pp. 66-8). His cabinet of seven contained no member of the commons besides himself. He alone, therefore, was to bear the main brunt of the battle. An immediate dissolution was expected (Life of Wilberforce, i. 48). Pitt was determined to appeal to the electorate; but he was equally determined not to dissolve until public opinion was strongly on his side. Fox, on the other hand, was set on preventing a dissolution, and hoped to drive Pitt from office by votes of the existing house. Pitt employed the recess in framing an India bill which, while establishing a board of control as a state department, left the paironage to the company. On the meeting of the commons on 12 Jan. 1784, Fox proposed, as a means of preventing dissolution, that the house should at once go into committee on the state of the nation. In the debate Pitt loftily defended himself against charges of intriguing with the king. He was in a minority of 39. The attack was renewed on the 16th, when the opposition majority was 21. On the 23rd Pitt's India bill was rejected by a majority of eight, and violent offorts were made in vain to provoke him to disclose his intentions. The king, who regarded him as his one hope of salvation from the men he hated, was in despair, and wrote that he rhought a dissolution necessary for the preservation of the constitution. But Pitt romeined firm. A body of 'independent' members proposed, and the king assented, that Pitt should meet the Duke of Portland with a view to a combination, and on 2 Feb. the house voted that a united ministry was necessary. Pitt refused to resign office as a preliminary to union, and declared that as the right of dismissal did not rest with the commons, a minister might constitutionally retain office against the will of the house. Hedenied its right to express a general want of confidence without specific charges. The proposed compromise failed.

The tide began to turn at the same time. The clerkship of the pells, worth 3,000l. a year, fell vacant, and, instead of taking it for himself, Pitt won universal admiration by bestowing it on Colonel Barré [q.v.] on condition that he surrendered a pension of greater value, which was thus saved to the country. Theking helped him by creating some peers on his nomination. The lords on 4 Feb. declared strongly in his favour, and the East India Company was on his side. On the 28th the freedom of the city was presented to him at a banquet. As he returned his carriage was attacked opposite Brooks's, the club frequented by his opponents, and he escaped with diffi-culty. This outrage excited much indignation. Fox's majority sank to twelve on 1 March. He proposed to delay supply, and Pitt cast on him the odium of endeavouring to throw the country into disorder. Addresses in Pitt's favour were presented to the king from many towns, and in the commons he succeeded in obtaining votes of supply. On the 8th Fox's 'Representation' to the king against the ministers was carried by only one vote, and the next day the Mutiny bill was passed without opposition. The victory was won, and the king dissolved on 24 March, the day fixed by Pitt (see Lucky, Hist. of England, iv. 297-308; MAY, Const. Hist. i. 83). Throughout the struggle Pitt was aided by the mistakes of Fox, but he owed his victory to his own skill and determination.

At the general election of 1784 he was returned for the university of Cambridge, and kept that seat during the rest of his life. His triumph was assured by the rejection of 160 of Fox's party, and he was at this date supported by a greater degree of popular favour than had ever been accorded to any minister. In the debate on the address Pitt's majority was 282 to 114. He at once turned his attention to the nation's finances, which were in grave disorder. The interest of the funded debt, the civil list, appropriated duties, and the expenses of the services exceeded the permanent taxes by 2,000,000%, and there was an unfunded debt of about 14,000,000l. of which the bills were at 15 to 20 per cent. discount. Towards funding this debt Pitt issued a loan of 6,500,000%, for he would not disturb the money market by going too fast. Consulting only the interest of the country, he took the then novel step of offering the loan for public tender, and accepting the most advantageous terms. He dealt a decisive blow at smuggling by lowering the duties on the articles most largely smuggled, while he increased the smugglers risks by the 'Hovering Act.' The duty on tea he reduced from 119 to 12; per cent., ad valorem, providing for the anticipated loss by a window tax. The success of this measure established his reputation as a financier. In his budget he proposed various taxes calculated to return 930,000% (Tomlind, i. 483-507; Dowell, Hist. of Taxation, ii. 184-7). In this and all his schemes for taxation he aimed at making all classes contribute to the revenue without pressing unfairly on any. Nor, though there was much that was new in his finance, did he strive for novelty; for he constantly adopted and improved on the devices of earlier financiers. His new India Bill, which passed easily, gave the crown political power, while it left to the directors the appointment of those who were to carry out the orders of the board of control. It established the system of double government, which, with some modifications, remained in force until 1858.

In the session of 1785 he suffered a damaging defeat in his attempt to nullify Fox's election to Westminster, and by the course he pursued incurred the charge of acting vindictively. By his motion for parliamentary reform of 18 April, which he pressed eagerly, he proposed to extinguish by purchase the privileges of borough-holders or electors in thirty-six decayed boroughs, and to transfer the seventy two seats to the larger counties and the cities of London and Westminster, and to proceed in like manner in the future if other boroughs fell into decay (Parl. Hist. xxv. 415). Neither the cabinet nor the opposition was unanimous on the motion, and Pitt did not treat it as one on which the fate of the government was to depend. He spoke on it with eloquence, but was defeated by 248 to 174, and, greatly as he desired reform, would never again do anything for its accomplishment (LECKY, v. 63). In his budget of 9 May 1785 he further reduced the floating debt by new taxes, some of which were opposed, and passed with modifications. including a number of taxes of various kinds in a single group, known as the assessed taxes, he checked waste and fraud. sought to free trude from restrictions, and, anxious to strengthen the bond between Great Britain and Ireland, drew up resolutions establishing free trade and reciprocity between the two countries, and providing that Ireland should contribute towards the protection of the commerce of the empire in proportion to the consequent improvement in its trade. His scheme, presented in resolutions to the Irish parliament on 7 Feb. 1785, passed with a general concurrence, and on 22 Feb. Pitt introduced it in the English parliament. Here it was vehemently opposed, and he was forced to modify it in the interests of English manufacturers (Parl. Hist. xxv. 778). The bill was recast, scriously to the detriment of Ireland' (LDCKY); it was, in its new form, passed in England, but was rejected by the Irish parliament. In 1786 another government measure, the proposal to fortify Plymouth and Portsmouth, was rejected by the speaker's casting vote. Such rebuffs were due partly to the fact that the ministerial party was not knit together by enthusiasm for any great question, partly to some distrust of Pitt's youth, and partly to his manners, which, though genial in private life, were stiff and haughty with his political supporters (WILBERFORCE, i. 78).

Pitt's financial successes enabled him in 1786 to bring forward a scheme for the reduction of the national debt. He regarded the debt as an excessive burden on the country, and in that belief declared it better for the country to borrow at a high than at a low rate of interest (Parl. Hist. xxiv. 1022). Having a surplus of revenue of nearly a million, he proposed that a million a year should be placed in the hands of commissioners to be applied to the reduction of the debt, and that to it should be added the interest of the sums so redeemed, that this 'sinking fund' should be out of the control of the government, and that its operation should continue whatever the financial condition of the country might be. A sinking fund had already been tried by Walpole; Pitt owed his scheme to Dr. Richard Price (1723-1791) [q. v.] He believed, and people generally agreed with him, that if it was carried out without interruption it would extinguish the debt simply by the efficacy of compound interest (ib. xxv. 1310). The scheme was adopted, and by 1793 ten and a quarter millions of debt had thus been paid off. But it has long been proved that there is nothing spontaneous in the working of such a fund, and that public debt can only be lessened by taxation. It is obvious that the maintenance of the fund during the war which began in 1793, so far from being economical, was extremely wasteful, for the nation borrowed vast sums at high rates and applied part of them to paying off debts which bore a low rate of interest. This was not perceived at the time, and the knowledge that the fund was maintained helped to support public credit, and so strengthened Pitt's position during the worst periods of depression (McCulloon, Tracts, pp. 526-53, 572 sqq.)
The charges against Warren Hastings[q.v.]

were promoted by the opposition, and were opposed by Pitt's friends generally. He voted against the Robilla charge, which was rejected on 2 June 1786; but when, on 18 June, Fox brought forward the Benares charge, to the astonishment of all he spoke and voted for it, and it was carried by 119 to 79 (Parl. It is probable that on Hist. xxvi. 102). studying the charges he came to the conclusion that he could not honourably continue to support Hastings. He voted for the Begum charge in February 1787, and thus rendered the impeachment certain (Stanhoff, i 298-305, 327; Memoirs of Sir P. Francis, ii. 237; ROSEBERY, Pitt, pp. 84, 87-8). During 1780 he was engaged on a commercial treaty with France, negotiated by William Eden, afterwards Lord Auckland [q. v.], on lines suggested by Bolingbroke in 1713, and contemplated by Shelburne. Pitt's attitude signally exhibited his dislike of restrictions on trade and his freedom from national prejudice. Fox objected to the treaty in January 1787 on the ground that France was the unalterable enemy of England. Pitt replied that 'to suppose that any nation could be unalterably the enemy of another was weak and childish.' The treaty was approved by a large majority. By reducing the duties on French wines it revived the taste for them in England, and the consumption increased rapidly (LICKY, v. 37-46; Parl. Hist. xxvi. 233, 382-407). His consolidation of the port and excise duties and the produce of other taxes into one fund was an important fiscal improvement (Downer, ii. 192), and the masterly fashion in which he dealt with the nearly three thousand resolutions occupied by this intricate measure excited the admiration even of the opposition (Tomline, ii. 233-49). Both in this year (1787) and in 1789 he resisted motions for the repeal of the Test and Corporations Acts; for, though not opposed to religious freedom, he held that the alliance of church and state was founded on expediency, that the restrictions imposed by the acts were necessary to it, and that they were not in themselves unreasonable (Parl. Hist, xxvi, 825, xxix, 509),

In 1787 events induced Pitt to specially direct his attention to foreign affairs. He held the independence of Holland to be a matter of the highest importance, and desired to check the growth of French influence there. The stadtholder, the Prince of imposition of restrictions, and Lord-chancellor Orange, who favoured the English alliance, had been forced by the 'patriot' party, which was in close alliance with France, to leave the Hague. Active assistance was promised by France to the states, while a Prussian army was sent to reinstate the prince. Pitt promised to aid the Prussians with a fleet. War seemed imminent, and Pitt made full preparations for it. the Prussians were received in Holland as allies, France held back, the stadtholder was reinstated, and both England and France agreed to put an end to their preparations for war (27 Oct.) Since the American war England had no ally on the continent except Portugal. Pitt followed up the success of his policy in Holland by an alliance in 1788 with the states and with Prussia. He thus re-established English influence abroad.

Early in that year he had a hard struggle over his India declaratory bill, which compelled the board of control to maintain a . permanent body of troops out of the funds of the company. The course of the struggle illustrates the extent to which the hold of the government on its majority depended on Pitt personally (Court and Cabinets, i. 856, 361; Annual Register, 1788, xxx. 108-21). His bill finally passed with some modifications. The success of his financial measures enabled him for the time to dispense with any new taxes, and to bring forward a plan for compensating the American loyalists, It was in accordance with his advice that Wilberforce took up the slave-trade question, and, Wilberforce being ill, Pitt, on 9 May 1788, brought forward his resolution on the subject for him. It was supported by Fox and Burke, and was carried (Life of Wilberforce, i. 151, 171). In the same session he supported Sir William Dolben's bill for regulating the slave trade [see under DOLBEN, SIR JOHN], in 1789 and 1790 upheld Wilberforce's motions, and on 2 April 1792, in opposition to many of his followers, urged the immediate abolition of the trade in a speech which, eloquent throughout, ended with a gorgeous peroration (Parl. Hist. xxix. 1134-88, 1277).

In November 1788 Pitt's position was imperilled by the king's insanity. Had the Prince of Wales become regent, Pitt would have been dismissed in favour of Fox and his party. Pitt, while he looked forward unmoved to loss of office, held that it was for parliament to name a regent, and to impose such restrictions on him for a limited time as would enable the king, on his recovery, to resume his power without difficulties. The prince and his party intrigued to prevent the Thurlow treacherously abetted them. On 10 Dec. Pitt moved for a search for precedents; Fox declared that the prince had an inherent right to the regency with sovereign powers, and that parliament had merely to decide when that right was to be exercised. Pitt, on hearing this argument, whispered to his neighbour, 'I'll unwhig the gentleman for the rest of his life' (Life of Sheridan, ii. 88). While acknowledging that the prince had an irresistible claim, he maintained that it was not of strict right, and was to be decided on by parliament. He answered an intemperate attack by Burke by a dignified appeal to the house. On the 16th his resolutions for a bill of regency were carried by a majority of sixty-four (Court and Cabinets, ii. 49-54). Still many wavered, and some members of the cabinet were inclined, in case of a regency, to coalesce with the opposition. Not so Pitt, who contemplated returning to work at the bar (Rose, i. 90). Impressed by his high-minded conduct, the London merchants offered him a gift of 100,000%, which he declined. On the 30th he wrote to the prince announcing the provisions of his regency bill, which withheld the power of making peers, and of granting pensions or offices except during pleasure, and placed the king's person and household, with the patronage, amounting to over 200,000*l*. a year, wholly in the queen's hands. These provisions were drawn up in the well-grounded expectation that the king's disablement was temporary. The bill passed the commons on 5 Feb. 1789; its progress in the lords was stopped by the king's recovery. Meanwhile, the Irish parliament had invited the prince to assume the regency in Ireland with full powers, but Pitt upheld the lord lieutenant, the Marquis of Buckingham, in his refusal to present the address to the prince, and recommended creations and promotions in the peerage as rewards of Buckingham's supporters (Court and Cabinets, ii. 146, 156). The violence and tactical mistakes of the opposition were in part responsible for Pitt's triumph at this crisis; but his conduct throughout showed the highest skill and courage. The king was conscious of the debt that he owed him, and both inside and outside parliament his position was stronger than even at the date of his victory over Fox four years before.

The general election of October-November 1790 gave the government an increased majority; on important divisions it was generally well over a hundred. The king pressed Pitt to accept the Garter (December); he declined, and requested that it might be conferred on his brother, Lord Chatham (STANIOPE, ii. App. p. xiii). At the king's request he accepted, in August 1792, the wardenship of the Cinque ports, which was worth about 3,000% a year. In the autumn of 1785 he had bought an estate called Hollwood, near Bromley, Kent, raising 4,000% on it by mortgage, and paying 4,950% by 1794. He took much delight in the place, and loved to improve it. But his affairs rapidly fell into disorder; he neglected them, and his servants robbed him.

When the question was raised whether the impeachment of Hastings was abated by the late dissolution, Pitt had an interview with Fox. The rival statesmen treated each other cordially, and came to an agreement. On 17 Dec. Pitt spoke against the abatement with such masterly effect as 'to settle the controversy' (Parl. Hist. xxviii. 1087–1099; Life of Sidmouth, i. 80). The dislike of the English in Canada to the Quebec Act of 1774 made legislation necessary, and Pitt, in April 1791, brought forward a bill for the government of Canada. He proposed the creation of two separate colonies, in order that their mutual jealousy might prevent rebellion, and by his 'Constitutional Act' divided the country into Upper and Lower Canada, giving to each its own governor, house of assembly, and legislative council. Provision was made for a protestant clergy from lands called the clergy reserves, and the crown was empowered to grant hereditary honours in Canada. Both these last provisions were strongly opposed by Fox (Parl. Hist. xxix. 111). Soon afterwards Pitt came to an open rupture with Thurlow, the lord chancellor, who had long been an element of discord in the cabinet. Out of consideration for the king, Pitt bore for years with his opposition and ill-temper. In 1792, however, the chancellor vehemently opposed Fox's libel bill, to which Pitt gave a vigorous support. Pitt plainly told the king that he must choose between him and the chancellor, and George dismissed Thurlow (Stanhope, ii. 81, 72, 147-50, App. pp. xii, xiii).

Meanwhile foreign politics made heavy demands on Pitt's attention. Spain, hoping for help from France and Russia, had in 1789 seized a British trading station on Nootka Sound in Vancouver's Island, and had taken some English vessels. Pitt insisted on reparation, obtained a vote of credit in May 1790, and equipped the fleet for service. France, however, was diverted by domestic affairs; and though for a time war seemed certain, Spain drew back, and on 28 Oct. a convention was signed that satisfied the demands of England. The energy of the government raised Pitt's reputation abroad. In December Pitt, in a supplementary budget, arranged to pay the expense of the armament, amounting to 3,133,000% in four years by special taxes, which, so far as was possible, touched all classes (DOWELL, ii. 195-6). But while insisting on respect for the rights of Great Britain, Pitt was anxious to maintain peace, and to preserve the status quo and the balance of power in Europe. With this object he had, in 1788, forwarded the alliance between Great Britain, Holland, and Prussia. allies had, by threats of war, saved the independence of Sweden in that year, and their action secured British commerce in the Baltic. Though unable to stop the war of Catherine of Russia-whose forward policy was highly distast eful to Pitt—and her ally the Emperor Leopold II against the Turks, he persuaded the emperor, in 1790, to make an armistice with the Porte on the basis of the status quo.

In the negotiations with Russia, however, Pitt sustained a signal rebuff. Pitt considered that | (Ennour, Maret, Duc de Bassano, pp. 94-8), it was for the interest of the maritime powers to prevent Russia from establishing a naval torce in the Black Sea (Parl. Hist. xxix. 996), and agreed with Prussia to insist on Catherine's restitution of Oczakow and its district. The fleet was prepared for service, an ultimatum to the empress was despatched, and on 28 March 1791 Pitt moved an address pledging the commons to defray the expenses of the 'Russian armament.' The address of the 'Russian armament.' was carried by 228 to 135; but the arguments of the opposition were strong, the prospect of the war was unpopular, and Pitt, finding that persistence in the line of the status quo would risk the existence of the government, gave way, and Russia retained Oczakow. He was deeply mortified, his reputation at home and abroad suffered, and the alliance with Prussia was relaxed.

The revolution in France soon involved more perplexing considerations. Pitt had viewed the outbreak of 1789 as a domestic quarrel, which did not concern him, and into which he was resolved not to be drawn. To Elliot, who was in unofficial communication with Mirabeau, he wrote in October 1790 that England would preserve a scrupulous neutrality in the struggle of French political parties (STANHOPD, ii. 38, 48, 59; LECKY, v. 559), and Burke was convinced that it was impossible to move him from that position (Burke, Correspondence, iii. 343, 347). In February 1792 no thought of war had entered his head. Having on the 17th shown a surplus of 400,000l., he repealed taxes amounting to 223,000%, reduced the vote for seamen by two thousand men, declared that the Hessian subsidy would not be renewed, and, speaking of the sinking fund, said that in fifteen years twenty-five millions of debt would be paid off. Nor was it, he said, presumptuous to name fifteen years; for 'there never was a time when, from the situation of Europe, we might more reasonably expect fifteen years of peace than we may at the present moment' (Parl. Hist. xxix. 816-37). In the autumn, however, the situation changed. In August the French court to which the English ambassador was accredited had ceased to exist, and he was recalled from Paris. France had already declared war on Austria and Prussia. and in September conquered Savoy and Nice. In November Holland was threatened, and treaty rights set at naught by the opening of the Scheldt. Pitt recognised that England was bound by the treaty of 1788 to maintain the rights and independence of Holland (Rose, i. 114). Maret, a French envoy, found

Pitt eager to preserve peace as late as 2 Dec. but resolved never to consent to the opening of the Scheldt (Parl. Hist. xxx. 253 sq.)

Meanwhile French republican agents, and especially the insolent envoy Chauvelin, were busy in England. Societies were formed in London and Edinburgh to propagate revo-lutionary doctrines. Their members were in constant communication with Paris. Seditious publications were widely distributed among British soldiers and sailors, and riots were raised. The government issued a proclamation against seditious writings: on Pitt's advice the militia was partially called out, and he supported the alien bill, a police measure rendered necessary by the crowd of French immigrants (Parl. IIIist, xxx. 229-38). Chauvelin, who had no recognised diplomatic position, made himself personally obnoxious to Pitt, who refused to see him, and, when the news of the king's murder reached England. he was ordered to leave the kingdom. On 30 Jan. 1793 the French agent Maret, who was acceptable to Pitt, revisited London in an informal capacity. Pitt voted in the cabinet to receive him, but Lord Hawkesbury, in the king's name and his own, opposed his reception. The majority supported Hawkesbury (Ernour, p. 126). The time for diplomatic intervention was then past. On 1 Feb. Pitt gave a masterly exposition of the provocations which the English government had received from France (Parl. Hist. xxx. 270 sq.), and on the same day France declared war against England. In the House of Commons Fox and his small party alone contested Pitt's prudence at this crisis, and throughout the continuance of the war pursued him and his policy with unremitting hostility. In 1794 the government was strengthened by the accession of the Duke of Portland, Lords Spencer and Fitzwilliam, and Windham, leading whigs who were in favour of a strenuous prosecution of the war. When asked whether he did not fear that these new allies might outvote him in the cabinet. Pitt replied that he had no such fear, for 'he placed much reliance on his new colleagues, and still more on himself' (Life of Sidmouth, i. 121).

Pitt believed that the finances of France would soon be exhausted, and that the war would therefore be short (Parl. Hist. xxxi. 1048-5; Life of Wilberforce, ii. 10, 02, 382). On this assumption he determined to meet the war expenses mainly by loans, so as to avoid a great increase of taxation and the danger of thereby checking commercial development. On 11 March 1793 he announced a continuance of some temporary taxes, and made up the deficiency in the estimates by borrowing four and a half millions. He tried to obtain this loan at 4 or 5 per cent., but was forced to issue it at 3 per cent. at a price of 721. In 1794, while imposing some new taxes, he announced a loan of eleven millions. He declared that commercial prosperity and the growth of the revenue would continue, since in all wars, while we had the superiority at sea, our trade had increased (Parl. Hist. u.s. 1022). In 1793 a serious monetary crisis took place, arising from causes unconnected with the war. To restore credit, Pitt issued exchequer bills for five millions, to be advanced on good security. Only four millions were borrowed, confidence was restored, and the money was repaid.

1261

At the same time the declaration of war made it, in Pitt's opinion, absolutely necessary that all domestic dissension should be suppressed. He shared the general fear of revolutionary doctrines, and believed it essential to check their dissemination. this object he supported, on 15 May 1793, the 'traitorous correspondence' bill, which was followed by prosecutions and judicial sentences that cannot be wholly justified. In May he brought in a Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill, which, though vehemently opposed by Fox and his party (Parl. Hist. xxx. 517), passed through all its stages in twentyfour hours. Such repressive measures were demanded and approved by popular sentiment. From the beginning of the war, too, Pitt, in his anxiety to avoid domestic disputes, opposed parliamentary reform. It was not, he said, speaking against a motion for it on the 17th, 'a time to embark on a constitutional change' (ib. pp. 890-902); he considered that the demand was urged by dangerous means, and that the bill itself went too far.

At the outset of the war Pitt resolved to meet the aggressions of France by forming a great European coalition against her. Between March and October 1793 he concluded alliances with Russia, Sardinia, Spain, Naples, Prussia, Austria, Portugal, and some German princes, and granted subsidies of 832,000*l*, for the hire of foreign troops. The Austrian and Prussian armies were at first successful; at sea Hood in 1793 destroyed the French fleet in Toulon, although he was compelled to evacuate the town, which had been handed over to the English by the anti-Jacobins; gains were secured in the West Indies, and on 1 June 1794 Howe won his famous victory off Brest. But in Europe the tide turned, and in 1794 the Austrians and Prussians retreated into Germany. The Duke of York, in command of the laws. He embodied his plans in a bill con-British and subsidiary forces, was routed near taining provisions strongly savouring of state

Dunkirk, and the Belgic provinces and subsequently Holland were conquered. In spite of the resistance of the king, Pitt insisted on York's dismissal. The keeping the allies together taxed all Pitt's energies. In April he was forced to grant a subsidy of 1,226,000l. to Frederick William II of Prussia, who gave no return for it, and in 1795 signed a peace which neutralised North Germany

In a short time Austria and Sardinia were the only active allies left to England. 'We must,' Pitt said, 'anew commence the salvation of Europe' (ALISON, History, iii. 157). He formed a triple alliance with Russia and Austria, the Austrian emperor receiving a loan of four millions and a half. Russia, however, remained inactive, and the action of Austria was barren of results. From these disappointing results he turned hopefully to an ill-judged scheme for conveying French royalist troops to Brittany in English ships. Money and stores were liberally supplied for the expedition. The emigrant troops were landed on the peninsula of Quiberon, and in July 1795 were destroyed by Hoche. The disaster was attributed by the French refugees to Pitt's duplicity, and Fox declared that he had lowered the character of Britain by sending a gallant army to be massacred. While Pitt, no doubt, thought more of the possible advantage to England by the destruction of the enemy's munitions of war than of the success of the royalist cause in France, he fully performed his share in the expedition, and the accusations of disloyalty brought against him seem unfounded (Parl. Hist. xxxii. 170; cf. Forneron, Histoire des Emigrés, ii. 99-116, 150).

The budget of February 1795 marks the beginning of a long period of financial difficulty. Pitt was compelled both to increase taxation and to raise a loan of eighteen millions on terms equal to interest at 41. 16s. 2d. per cent. At the same time he observed that the foreign trade of the country 'surpassed even the most flourishing years of peace' (Parl. Hist. xxxi. 1815). Scarcity, however, prevailed owing to had harvests, and in August wheat was at 108s. a quarter. On going to open parliament in October, the king was greeted with cries of 'Bread,' 'Peace,' and 'No Pitt,' and a missile was aimed at him. The law of treason was at once extended, and Pitt carried a 'sedition bill.' The distress of the poor led Pitt to adopt a temporary measure of relief, which contravened his economic principles. He defended his action on the ground of emergency. In December he urged the necessity for a reform in the poor socialism, such as the formation of 'schools of industry,' and the supply of cows to paupers. The bill was laid before the commons, but it was severely criticised, and was abandoned (Times, 19 March 1838; STANHOPD, ii. 365-7; ROSEBERY, pp. 169-70) [see Bent-

HAM, JUREMY.

Early in 1795 Pitt had to meet an Irish difficulty. In 1785 he had sought to give Ireland the same commercial position as England, and to effect a parliamentary reform on a protestant basis (LECKY, vi. 375). French revolution, which won much sympathy in protestant Ulster, inclined him, however, to favour the claims of the Roman catholics, in whom he detected a powerful conservative element. Misled by the anticatholic spirit in Europe, he believed, too, that the papal system was near its end (ib. p. 497). He consequently supported the English Catholic Relief Bill of 1791, and insisted, with reference to the Irish Catholic Relief Bill of 1792, that the government should not pledge itself against further concessions. He considered that a legislative union would be the means by which catholics might most safely be admitted to the franchise (ib. 513). Already in the rejection of his commercial proposals and in the differences that had developed themselves on the subject of the regency he had been impressed by the difficulties arising from legislative independence. The Catholic Relief Act, passed by the Irish House of Commons in 1793, was due to the pressure that his government brought to bear on the government in Ireland, but the act stopped short of complete emancipation, and failed to alleviate Irish discontent. The whigs who joined Pitt in 1794 urged on him a policy of reform and emancipation. promised that Lord Fitzwilliam [see Fitz-WILLIAM, WILLIAM WENTWORTH, Second EARL], a strong whig, should be appointed viceroy, and Portland and Fitzwilliam at once led the whig leaders in Ireland to helieve that there would be a complete change of system and administration. Pitt had no intention of surrendering Ireland to the whigs, but to avoid a split in the cabinet he nominated Fitzwilliam, on the vague understanding that there were to be no sweeping changes, and that the admission of catholics to parliament should not be treated as a government question, though if he were pressed he might yield (Life of Grattan, iv. 177). Fitzwilliam, on his arrival in Ireland, dismissed John Beresford [q. v.] and other tory officials, and informed the cabinet that emancipation must be granted immediately. Pitt. with the assent of the cabinet, straightway recalled him, and thus roused the bitterest animosity among the exasperated catholics (Licky, vii. 1-98; Rosibery, pp. 174-85). Pitt's error lay in not giving Fitzwilliam more explicit instructions. The king was hostile to emancipation, and, although Pitt himself desired it, he considered that the time for it had not yet come. The personal question involved in the dismissal of his political friends also weighed much with him.

By the end of 1795 he was anxious for peace, and in March 1796 caused proposals to be laid before the French directory. They failed, and on 10 May Fox made their failure the occasion of a strenuous attack on the conduct of the war. Pitt replied ably, and had a majority of 210 to 42. In his budget, besides a new loan, he announced additions to the assessed taxes, and to the duties on horses and tobacco, and introduced a new tax on collateral successions (Dowell, ii. 213-15). A dissolution followed, and in the new parliament his majority was maintained, During the year Great Britain made some gains in the West Indies, but the French, though suffering some temporary reverses in Germany, conquered Italy. In the course of the general election Pitt had found it necessary to support the emperor by a loan of 1,200,000%, and he raised it without the consent of parliament. When attacked on the grant by the opposition in December, he argued that the loan came under the head of 'extraordinaries,' recognised as necessary in times of war; but, although he obtained a majority of 285 to 81, opinion was against him, and he promised not to repeat the irregularity. In the late autumn further attempts to obtain peace proved futile. France refused to give up the Netherlands (MALMES-BURY, Diaries, iii. 259-365), and threatened an invasion of Ireland. Pitt appealed to British patriotism by issuing a loyalty loan of eighteen millions at 5 per cent., which was taken up with enthusiasm at 100l. for 1121. 10s. stock. In his budget for 1797 he imposed additional taxes of over two millions, the incidence of which he made as general as possible, the more important being a third addition of 10 per cent. on the assessed taxes, and additions to the duties on tea, sugar, and spirits. The failure of the peace negotiations led to a run on the Bank of England. The directors appealed to Pitt for help, and on 26 Feb. 1797 cash payments were suspended by an order in council. The victory off Cape St. Vincent (14 Feb.) gave him only temporary consolation, for the mutiny of the fleet at the Nore in May, when the Dutch fleet was threatening invasion, seemed to paralyse the arm on which he , chiefly leant. England's prospects never looked less hopeful. Ireland was on the eve of open rebellion ; Russia deserted the anti-French policy of Catherine; in October Austria made peace with France; and the war on the continent came to an end. The general alarm was manifested by the fall in the price of consols to 48.

Throughout these calamities Pitt maintained an extraordinary calm, and made stirring appeals to the spirit of the nation. Nevertheless, he was anxious for peace, and in April 1797 obtained the king's unwilling consent to reopen negotiations. Grenville vehemently opposed him in the cabinet, but he was determined 'to use every effort to stop so bloody and wasting a war' (WIND-HAM, Diary, p. 368; MALMESBURY, u.s. iii. 369). To Malmesbury, who was sent to negotiate at Lille, Pitt gave secret instructions that, if necessary, he might offer France either the Cape or Ceylon (ib. iv. 128). The negotiations failed in September. Pitt's budget of November showed a deficit of twenty-two millions; three millions he borrowed from the bank, twelve he obtained by a new loan, and the remaining seven he provided for by a 'triple assessment,' graduated scale. His heavy demands expublic thanksgiving for the naval victories, he was insulted by the mob, and guarded by cavalry. The publication of the 'Anti-Jacobin, which began in the autumn, was useful to him, for it 'turned to his side the current of poetic wit which had hitherto flowed against him '(STANHOPE, iii. 84-9). At the same time the opposition in parliament had since July relaxed its aggressive energy, owing to the partial secession of Fox.

Pitt's health was weakened by the anxieties of the year, and neverfully recovered. He was ill in June 1798, and the opposition newspapers insisted, without the slightest ground, that he was insane. Wilberforce in July found him better, and 'improved in habits'—that is, probably drinking less port wine (Life of Wilberforce, p. 317). During the summer of 1800 his physiciansordered him to Bath, but public business kept him in town, and he prepared for the labours of the following November session by a visit of three weeks to Addington, the of the overture, and on 3 Feb. 1800 Pitt speaker. During 1796 he had taken much offered a masterly vindication of his policy pleasure in the society of Eleanor Eden, a daughter of Lord Auckland, but he explained to her father that his affairs were too embarrassed to allow him to make her an offer of tion; it was necessary to support Austria, and marriage. His debts amounted at the time on the 17th he announced that two millions to about 30,0004 (STANHOLD, iii. 1-4).

With the Irish rebellion of 1798 Pitt had little to do directly, but on its outbreak he considered it necessary to renew the suspension of habeas corpus, and other bills were passed for the suppression of secret societies and the regulation of newspapers. Measures of defence mainly absorbed his attention. During the debate on his bill on manning the navy, on 25 May, Tierney, who had become prominent in opposition to him, spoke against hurrying the bill through the house. Pitt suggested that he desired to obstruct the defence of the country, and Tierney sent him a challenge. Pitt informed the speaker of the matter as a friend, in order to prevent him from interfering, and he met Tierney on Sunday, 27 May, on Putney Heath. Both fired twice without effect, Pitt the second time firing in the air, and the seconds declared that honour was satisfied (Life of Sidmouth, i. 205; Life of Wilberforce, ii. 281-4).

The victory of the Nile on 1 Aug. 1798, its important and far-reaching consequences, and its effect on the European powers, aided Pitt in forming a second great coalition against France, which by the end of the year consisted of Great Britain, Portugal, Naples, Russia, and the Porte, Austria acceding soon afterwards. For a time the charging the payers of assessed taxes on a military operations on the continent, where Suwarow drove the French out of Italy in cited discontent, and in December, at the 1799, as well as the taking of Seringapatam (4 May), gave him encouragement. Believing that the Dutch were ready to rise against the French, he planned an expedition to Holland consisting of British and Russian troops. In August the British fleet captured the Dutch vessels in the Texel. The Duke of York took the command by land; the Dutch did not rise; the duke was unsuccessful, his army suffered from sickness, and he capitulated. Pitt, undismayed, planned an attempt on Brest in conjunction with French royalists, which happily was not carried out.

On 25 Dec. 1799 Bonaparte, the First Consul, wrote to George III personally, proposing negotiations. The adverse answer sent by Grenville was approved by Pitt, who no doubt rightly believed that negotiations would have dissolved the new coalition without leading to a lasting peace, but in tone and matter the letter was unfortunate. The government was attacked for the rejection (Parl. Hist. xxxiv. 1197-1203, 1301-97). He was, however, full of anxiety; Russia was illaffected and had withdrawn from co-operaand a half would be required for subsidies.

1 +1

In answer to Tierney, who challenged the ministers to deny that the object of the war was the restoration of monarchy in France, Pitt retorted, in a speech full of passionate eloquence, that its object was security (ib. pp. 1438-47). His hopes of Austria were disappointed, for she was forced to an armistice. Though meeting with strong opposition in the cabinet, he again made overtures for peace during the blockade of Malta. They failed, and Malta surrendered to the British.

The government's financial embarrassments were rapidly growing. Early in 1798 Pitt arranged to receive voluntary contributions to supplement payments due under the triple assessment, and himself contributed 2,000l. in lieu of his legal assessment (Rose, i. 210). In April he rendered the land tax perpetual and subject to redemption, and stock being as low as fifty-six, about a quarter of the charge was redeemed by the end of 1799 (Dowell, iii. 88). His budget of 3 Dec. 1798 showed an excess in supply over the ordinary revonue of more than twenty-three millions. Premising that the amount to be raised by loan should be as small as possible, and that no loan should be greater than could be paid within a limited time, he pointed out the defects of the triple assessment, which, he said, had been shamefully evaded, and proposed that a general tax should be levied on income, beginning with a 120th on incomes of 60l., and rising by degrees until on incomes of 2001. and upwards it reached ten per cent. This, he calculated, would return ten millions, but in 1799 the yield was little more than six (ib. p. 92). His resolutions were carried. He also issued a loan of three millions, and in June 1799 another of fifteen millions (NEWMARCH). His budget on 24 Feb. 1800 showed estimates for supply amounting to thirty-nine and a Half millions, and he announced the contract for a loan of eighteen and a half millions taken by the public at 1571. stock at three per cent. for 1001. money. Although his account of the revenue justified his belief in the growing commercial prosperity (ib. xxxiv. 1515-19), the wet and cold summer of 1799 had created widespread distress. Wheat rose to 120s, a quarter. Pitt desired to adopt remedial measures, but Grenville argued that artificial contrivances would increase the evil (Stanhoph, iii. 244-50). By Pitt's advice there was an early mooting of parliament in 1800 to consider measures for relief. He pointed out that war had no necessary connection with scarcity, and recommended regulation, though he deprecated the suggestion of 'a maximum price of corn' (ib. xxxv. 514-81, 789, 793).

Although Pitt had in 1792 looked on a legislative union with Ireland as the best . means of solving the religious difficulty, he did not set himself to carry it out until June 1798, when the rebellion was in progress. His tentative policy towards the catholics, and his want of precision in the Fitzwilliam affair, had helped to increase the ferment in Ireland (LECKY, viii. 281, 285), and the question of the union had become urgent. At first he hoped to effect a union on a basis of emancipation, but he soon doubted whether that would be possible (Castlereagh Correspondence, i. 404, 481; Cornwallie Correspondence, ii. 414-18). The cabinet generally was against such a scheme, and Clare [See FITZUIBBON, JOHN, EARL OF CLARE] persuaded Pitt in October to adopt an exclusively protestant basis for the union. Yet, while yielding to considerations of policy, he was determined that the union should be the means by which the catholics should attain political rights (Life of Wilberforce, ii. 318, 324). On 28 Jan. 1799 he brought proposals for the union before the British House of Commons, and was opposed by Sheridan. whose amendment received no support. He continued the debate on the 31st, when he made an eloquent speech, which he corrected for the press. He held out the prospect that the union would lead to the recognition of the catholic claims, which could not safely be admitted otherwise, and that, after it was effected, emancipation would depend only on the conduct of the catholics and the temper of the times. He ended by moving eight resolutions which were carried. Pitt has been blamed for the means taken by the Irish government to obtain a majority. He has been charged with cynically securing the assent of the Irish parliament to its own dissolution, by recklessly bribing its members. Extensive jobbery was practised by Cornwallis and Castlereagh in accordance with the evil traditions of Irish politics before the union, and Pitt, as prime minister, must be held largely responsible for their doings (Cornwallis Correspondence, iii. 8, 100). But the amount and character of the corruption sanctioned by Pitt have often been exaggerated. Little money was sent from England during the struggle (ib. pp. 84, 151, 156, 184; Castle-reagh Corresp. iii. 260; LECKY, viii. 409; INGRAM, Irish Union, p. 219), and little, if any, was spent in the purchase of votes. Cornwallis declared it would be bad and dishonourable policy to offer money-bribes. Some Irish members of the opposition vacated their seats during the struggle, induced by money payments, promises, or grants of pen-The bill disfranchised eighty-four boroughs, and Pitt, in the Reform Bill which he had vainly introduced into the English House of Commons in 1785, had accepted the principle that compensation was due to dispossessed borough-holders. Other views prevailed in 1832; but in 1798, unless provision had been made for such compensation, no bill which involved the disfranchisement of boroughs would have had any chance of passing the legislature either in Ireland or Under Pitt's scheme, as accepted by the Irish legislature, a court was established for the settlement of borough-holders' claims, and 1,260,000% was paid under the act. In a few instances official posts were promised or granted; seven officers of the crown were dismissed and two resigned. Pitt allowed Cornwallis and Castlereagh to promise honours to some waverers. At the end of the struggle there were granted in fulfilment of these pledges sixteen new peer-ages and nineteen promotions in the Irish peerage, and four or five English peerages to Irish peers. Pitt's methods will not be approved in the light of modern political morality. But it is difficult to detect any flaw in the arguments by which he convinced himself and others that the measure was essential to the stability of the empire and the welfare of Ireland. The Irish parliament having passed the bill for the union on 28 March 1800, the first imperial parliament of Great Britain and Ireland met on 22 Jan.

In the king's speech, Pitt referred to the unfortunate course of the war. The failure of the coalition was fully declared by the treaty of Luneville, and Russia had renewed the policy of 1780 by forming an alliance of armed neutrality in the north. Still undaunted, Pitt urgod the importance of a naval attack before the northern powers had assembled their forces, and maintained the justice of the British system with respect to neutrals. To this he ascribed 'that naval preponderance which had given security to this country and more than once afforded chances for the salvation of Europe' (ib. pp. 908-18). His position in the house may be gauged by the rejection of an amendment to the address by 245 to 63, the opposition being in comparatively strong force. A few weeks later he ceased to hold ministerial office.

Pitt, in accordance with his original view, had regarded the Irish union as incomplete without catholic emancipation; and while not definitely pledging himself to that effect, had allowed Cornwallis to enlist the votes of catholics on the understanding that it would follow (Castlereagh Corresp. iv. 10, 11, 34). Accordingly, he had at once YOL. XV.

planned with Grenville the abolition of the sacramental test, the commutation of tithes in both countries, and a provision for the Irish catholic clergy and dissenting ministers (Court and Cabinets, iii. 128-9). The lordchancellor, Loughborough, who spoke against Pitt's plan in the cabinet on 30 Sept. 1800. betrayed Pitt's intentions to the king, and did all he could to intensify George's dislike of the proposals. Pitt, while the matter was still before the cabinet, abstained from speaking of it to the king. On 29 Jan. the speaker, Addington, by the king's request, endeavoured to dissuade him from his purpose. On the 31st Pitt learnt that the king had declared that he should reckon any one who proposed emancipation as his personal enemy. Thereupon he wrote to George that, unless he could bring the measure before parliament with the royal concurrence and the whole weight of government, he must resign. George was obdurate. On 3 Feb. Pitt announced his intention of resigning, and the king agreed to accept his resignation. He did not, however, quit office immediately. On 18 Feb. he brought forward his budget, announcing loans of twenty-eight millions and additional taxation calculated at 1,794,000%. For the first time his budget was not opposed. Wishing to calm the catholics, Pitt instructed Castlereagh to write a letter to Cornwallis, promising the catholics the support of the outgoing ministers. His surrender of his seals was delayed by the king's derangement. On 6 March he was much moved by a message from the king attributing his illness to Pitt's conduct. Although he remained convinced of the necessity of emancipation to the end of his life (Parl. Debates, xvi. 1006), he sent back an assurance that during George's reign he would never agitate the catholic question (STANHOPE, iii. 804). Thereupon some of his friends urged him to cancel his resignation. He hesitated, but decided not to do so except at the king's request, and on the voluntary withdrawal of Addington, who had been designated his successor with his concurrence. Addington declined to move in the matter, and Pitt finally deemed the project improper (Rose, i. 829; MALMUS-BURY, iv. 83-7). The king recovered, and on 14 March Pitt formally resigned; among those that went out of office with him were Lords Grenville, Spencer, and Cornwallis, Dundas, Windham, and Canning. On 25 March Pitt haughtily declared in the commons that he had not resigned to escape difficulties. His assertion was undoubtedly strong, Pitt did what he could to strengthen it. He probably promised his support to Addington too unconditionally (MALMES-BURY, iv. 75). On the whole, he heartily approved the preliminaries of the peace of Amiens of 1801, differing therein from Grenville and others of his friends. During the session of 1802 he relaxed his attendance in parliament, but maintained constant communication with Addington. In February he was attacked in the commons by Tierney, in his absence, and felt aggrieved by the lukewarmness of Addington in his defence. But he advised Addington on both the budget in April and the royal speech in June. Grenville and others urged on him the weakness of the government and the need of a strenuous policy in view of a probable renewal of the war. He became convinced that the peace would not last, and that measures should be taken to show that England would not submit to injury or insult. On 12 April he was violently attacked by Sir Francis Burdett [q. v.], and on 7 May John Nicholls moved an address to the king thanking him for having dismissed Pitt. The house, however, voted by 211 to 52 that Pitt had rendered great and important services to the country, and descrives the thanks of the house.' His birthday (28 May 1802) was celebrated by a dinner, for which Canning wrote the song 'The pilot that weathered the storm.' Pitt, who was residing at Walmer Castle, was not present.

Convinced that it was important for the

Private debts were causing Pitt much embarrassment. Though his official salaries had for some years amounted to 10,500%, he owed 45,000% in 1801. On the loss of his political salaries, his creditors became pressing, and an execution was feared. The London merchants again tendered him 100,000% and the king proposed a gift of 30,0001. from his privy purse, but he declined both offers. Finally fourteen of his friends and supporters advanced him 11,700% as a loan, and he sold Hollwood which, after the mortgage on it was paid, brought him 4,000%. (Rosn, i. 402-27; Adolphus, History, vii. 595-6; Stanhoph, iii. 841-9). In September 1802 he had at Walmer a sharp attack of illness, which necessitated a visit to Bath next month. In 1803 he took his niece, Lady Hester Stanhope, to live with him, and, while spending the autumn at Walmer, organised and reviewed a large body of Cinque port volunteers in anticipation of a French invasion. When subsequently Napoleon gathered about Boulogne 130,000 men ready to invade England, Pitt, while at Walmer, busily attended reviews and promoted works of defence.

Late in 1802 Canning and Grenville had country that the new ministry should be strongly represented to him the incapacity of the ministers, and that it was his duty to 'resume his position.' He replied that he was bound by an engagement to support Addington, though if the cabinet should ask his advice, and then act contrary to it, his hands would be free. His absence from London was prolonged at the entreaty of his friends, who desired that it should signify his disapproval of the government's policy. At Addington's earnest request he visited him on 5 Jan. 1803, but left unexpectedly the next day. On a renewal of his visit Addington suggested that he should return to 'an official situation,' meaning that he should form some coalition. Pitt answered guardedly (Life of Sidmouth, ii. 112-13). While avowing to his friends, who made no secret of it, his dislike of the government's proceedings, and specially of its finance, he still refused to take any step that might overthrow it (Court and Cabinets, iii. 251).

By the middle of March 1808 it was evident that war was at hand, but Pitt remained at Walmer. On the 20th Addington sent Lord Melville (Dundas) to propose that he and Pitt should hold office together under some first lord of the treasury to be named by Pitt, auggesting Pitt's brother, Lord Chatham. When Melvillo opened the scheme Pitt seems to have cut him short, and said afterwards in reference to the interview, 'Really I had not the currosity to ask what I was to be' (Life of Wilberforce, ni. 219). Later, he declined the proposals, declaring his disapproval of the government's finance and policy generally, and saying that there should be a real first minister, and that finance should be in his hands (Colonistie, Diary, i. 414). Addington then requested an interview with a view to Pitt's reinstatement as prime minister. Pitt agreed to meet him on 10 April at Charles Long's Meanwhile Grenville arrived at house. Walmer, and communicated to Pitt the terms on which he might reckon on the support of him and his friends. Grenville insisted that a new ministry should be formed by Pitt, and urged the admission of some members of the old opposition, like Moira and Grey. On that point Pitt expressed his unwillingness to act contrary to the king's wishes (Court and Calinets, iii. 282-90). But resolving to adopt Grenville's first suggestion, he told Addington at their meeting that, if the king called upon him, he must submit his own list of ministers, and suggested that Addington should take a peerage and the speakership of the lords. Addington demanded the exclusion of Grenville and Windham. Several letters passed without advancing matters (Life of Sidmouth, ii. 119-29; Rosn, ii. 33-40), the differences between them grew acute, and their old friendship was interrupted. The feebleness of Addington and his ministry meanwhile excited much popular ridicule. Pasquinades, the best of which are by Canning, appeared in a paper called the 'Oracle' (reprinted in the 'Spirit of the Public Journals,' 1803-4), and exposed the absurdity of Addington's pretensions to rival Pitt; for, as Canning wrote,

'Pitt is to Addington As London to Paddington.'

War was declared on 16 May 1803, and Pitt returned to London on the 20th. The country's need of a strenuous policy draw him back to parliament. Towards the ministry he assumed an independent attitude, supporting strong war measures, and opposing those that were weak and insufficient. In speaking in behalf of the address on the 23rd. he warned the house that the struggle would be more severe than during the last war, and that the French would strive to break the spirit of the nation. His speech, which was virtually unreported, was held to be the finest he had made (Malmesbury, iv. 256), and, although its delivery showed signs of impaired physical power, Fox said that 'if Demosthenes had been present, he must have admired and might have envied 'it (Memoirs of Horner, i. 221). On a vote of censure on the ministry on 3 June, he moved the orders of the day, saying that, while he would not join in the censure, he held the ministers to blame. His motion was lost by 335 to 58, the minority roughly representing the number of his personal following as distinct from Grenville's party. Pitt's motion appears to have been a tactical mistake; it satisfied no section (MALMESBURY, iv. 263-4; Life of Sidmouth, ii. 140). At the close of the session, Pitt was attacked by Addington's party in a pamphlet entitled 'A few cursory Remarks, &c.'; he at once instructed his friend George Rose (1744-1818) [q.v.] to procure an answer. This was written by Thomas Peregrine Courtenay [q. v.], and other pamphlets followed on both sides. Although exasperated by this attack, Pitt resolved not to depart from his position of neutrality, and persisted for a while in what Grenville, with some irritation, described as 'middle lines and managements and delicacies "où l'on se perd"' (Court and Cabinets, iii. 842; MALMIS-BURY, iv. 288-91). But from the beginning of 1804 he showed increased hostility to the government. In February, when there was a strong probability of invasion, he condemned the ministerial measures for defence as inadequate; and on 15 March, when he moved for papers on the navy, passed severe strictures, some of which were ill-founded, on the administration of Lord St. Vincent, the first lord of the admiralty (Spinches, iv. 275, 287; Mahan, ii. 128). On the 19th, however, he supported the government against the followers of Fox and Grenville.

At the moment the king was ill, and Pitt wished to avoid a crisis. If, in forming a ministry, he found that the king insisted on the exclusion of Fox and Grenville, he determined to yield (Letter of 29 March; STANHOFE, iv. 142-8). After the recess he went into avowed opposition. On 16 April he denounced a government measure; the followers of Fox and Grenville voted with him, and the majority sank to twenty-one. Addington invited his advice on the situation. He answered that his opinion as to a new government was at the service of the king. The lord-chancellor, Eldon, called on him, at the king's request, at his house, No. 14 York Place. He communicated these proceedings to Fox, and through Fox to Grenville, and promised, in general terms, to persuade the king to consent to a comprehensive government. He informed the king of his intention of opposing the go-vernment, and on the 23rd and 25th spoke strongly against its policy. Addington's resignation was now imminent, and the king ordered Pitt to prepare a plan for a new government. Pitt requested permis-sion to treat with Fox and Grenville. The king angrily refused, and demanded of Pitt a pledge to maintain the Test Act. Pitt renewed his promise as to the catholics, and on 7 May, in a long interview with the king, sought to overcome his objections to Fox and He ultimately obtained per-Grenville. mission to include Grenville and some of his party. Pitt consented to form an administration on these terms. He hoped in a short time to bring Fox into the cabinet, and to persuade him meanwhile to accept a mission to Russia. But next day he was informed that none of Fox's or Grenville's friends would take office without Fox. Foxdeclined to see him. He thus lost the help of, among others, Lords Grenville, Spencer, and Fitzwilliam, and Windham, and was forced to look merely to his own friends and some of the existing ministers. He was highly indignant with Grenville. Ho would, he said, teach that proud man that in the service. and with the confidence of the king, he could do without him, though he thought his health such that it might cost him his life' (Rosn, ii. 118-29; Malmosbury, iv. 299-302; Life of Eldon, i. 447). 4 ar 2

Pitt re-entered office as first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer on 10 May 1804; his cabinet consisted of twelve members, of whom he and Castlereagh alone were in the commons; six were members of the late government, the rest were chosen from his own following; it was therefore urged another visit to Bath, but he was kept neither comprehensive nor thoroughly homo-Arrayed against him were three geneous. parties, respectively headed in the commons by Addington, Windham, and Fox. The return to a more vigorous policy was at once apparent. In June the government's Additional Force Bill, although attacked by all three parties in opposition, was carried after a sharp struggle. At the close of the session Pitt went to Walmer, but as he was constantly needed in London, he rented a house on Putney Heath, that he might have country air while attending to his official duties.

Pitt was endeavouring to form a third coalition against France. The negotiations proceeded slowly. A preliminary agreement was formed between Russia and Austria in November; but Prussia stood aloof, and Russia was offended by the British capture of the Spanish treasure-ships. Spain declared war against Great Britain on 3 Dec. On 19 Jan. 1805 Pitt, being assured of the goodwill of Austria, formally invited the accession of Russia (Alison, vi. 391-3). The Anglo-Russian convention was signed on 11 April; Sweden and Austria also entered the alliance.

Pitt had during the summer of 1804 also been engaged in negotiating a reconciliation between the king and the Prince of Wales, and he seems to have made some inquiry as to the possibility of obtaining the support of the prince's friends, but was answered in the negative (Court and Cabinets, iii. 873-6). His ministry needed strengthening. able to obtain aid elsewhere, he communicated with Addington, who accepted a peerage, as Viscount Sidmouth, and entered the cabinet on obtaining a promise from Pitt that some of his friends and relatives should receive secondary offices as soon as possible (Life of Sidmouth, ii. 324-44). Pitt and Addington had a personal reconciliation on 23 Dec. On the opening of the next session the opposition in the commons showed some vigour, but on 11 Feb. 1805 Pitt obtained a majority on the Spanish war of 313 to 106. On the 18th he expounded his budget; the estimates were enormous, the total charges, exclusive of the interest on debts, being put at forty-four millions. A loan of twenty millions was announced, and, to meet the interest, augmentations were made to postage and various duties; the property tax was also increased by twenty-five per cent. During this session most of the ministerial depart ments depended on Pitt for inspiration, and the incessant work told heavily on his declining health. By the end of 1804 he felt the need of rest and solitude. His physicians in London by the negotiations with Russia. Again at Easter 1805 he was detained by public business.

Pitt was much harassed by the charges brought against his old friend Melville [see under DUNDAS, HENRY, first VISCOUNT MDLVILLD], then first lord of the admiralty. Convinced that Melville had not 'pocketed any public money,' he determined to support him. Sidmouth, however, by a threat of resignation, forced him to agree to a select committee of inquiry (Colonister, i. 546-7). On 8 April 1805 he advocated this course as against a motion for censure. When the speaker, the numbers on division being equal. gave his casting vote for the censure, one of Pitt's friends saw the tears trickling down his cheeks.' Some young members of his party formed a circle round him, and in their midst he walked out of the house shielded from the brutal curiosity of his opponents. His mortification probably helped to shorten his life (MALMUSBURY, iv. 347). During the further proceedings against Melville, a question was raised as to an advance that Pitt had in 1796 made from the navy funds to certain contractors for a public loan; no imputation was made on his integrity. He admitted that he had acted irregularly for the benefit of the country, and a bill of indemnity was passed unanimously. On 14 May he spoke against the catholic petition presented by Fox, referred to his previous policy, and declared that a revival of the catholic claims would be useless, and would only create discord.

When Melville resigned, Sidmouth demanded an appointment that would have placed office at the disposal of one of his relatives. Pitt refused to act on the suggestion, and Sidmouth, who charged him with a breach of the agreement made in December, threatened with his follower, Lord Buckinghamshire, to retire. Pitt persuaded Sidmouth to remain (26 April), promising that his friends should be at liberty to vote as they pleased on Molville's impeachment, and that their claims should be considered. despite professions of good feeling, their mutual relations were unstable. Sidmouth's brother, Hiley Addington, and Bond, one of his party, pressed matters against Mclville with such violence that Pitt declared that 'their conduct must be marked,' and that he could not give them places. Sidmouth was offended, and he and Buckinghamshire resigned on 5 July.

At the close of the session of 1805, Pitt's health was bad, but his hopes ran high. In August Napoleon's plan of invasion ended in failure, and in September Pitt took leave of Nelson. The coalition seemed to promise well. He was, however, fully aware of the weakness of his ministry, and in September visited the king at Weymouth, and pressed upon him the need of opening negotiations with Fox and (†renville, but George refused to yield and Pitt forbore from further insistence for fear of injuring the king's health (Rose, ii. 198-201). In order to strengthen his cabinet, he decided to bring in Canning and Charles Yorke.

The news of the capitulation of Ulm (20 Oct.) affected him deeply. When he first heard it on 2 Nov., he doclined to credit it; the next day, when it was confirmed, his look and manner changed, and Lord Malme-bury had a foreboding of his death (MALMESBURY, iv. 340). The mingled joy and sorrow that the news of Trafalgar (21 Oct.) brought him (ib. p. 341) destroyed his sleep, which had hitherto been proof against all mental excitement. On the 9th he attended the lord mayor's banquet, and was in good spirits. When he was toasted as 'the Saviour of Europe,' he simply said that Europe was not to be saved by any one man, and that 'England has saved herself by her exertions; and will, as I trust, save Europe by her example? (STANHOPE, iv. 846). Nelson's victory had given him fresh hopes, and he offered Frederick William of Prussia large subsidies if he would join in the war. On 7 Dec. he found

On 7 Dec. he found it possible to go to While there the news of the battle of Austerlitz (2 Dec.) gave him his death-When he heard of the armistice that followed it, the gout left his feet, and he fell into extreme physical debility. He was removed from Bath on 9 Jan. 1806, and took three days on the journey to his house at Putney. As he entered the house he noticed the map of Europe on the wall. 'Roll up that map,' he said; 'it will not be wanted these ten years.' On the 13th he received Lords Hawkesbury and Castlereagh, and on the 14th drove out and received Lord Wellesley, who found his intellect as bright as over. He took to his bed on the 16th, and was visited ministerially on the 22nd by his old tutor, Bishop Pretyman, to whom he dictated his last wishes. The following night his mind wandered, and he died ourly on the 23rd, his last words being, 'Oh, my country! how I leave my country!' (STANHOPE, vol. iv. App. p. xxxi). His debts, amounting to 40,000/.—exclusive of the 11,700/. advanced by friends, who declined repayment —were paid by the nation; pensions were granted to his three nieces, and a public funeral was voted, which was carried out on 22 Feb. in Westminster Abbey.

There are statues by Westmacott in Westminster Abbey, by Chantrey in Hanover Square, London, by J. G. Bubb in the Guildhall, London (with an inscription by Canning), and by Nollekens in the senate-house, Cambridge. Flaxman executed a bust. portrait was painted by Gainsborough, Hoppner (painted in 1805), and Sir Thomas Lawrence. The last is at Windsor. That by Gainsborough, of which there are replicas and copies, is engraved in Stanhope's 'Life;' of that by Hoppner there are copies and an engraving in Gifford's 'Life.' A drawing, by Copley, of Pitt in his youth, was engraved by Bartolozzi; and again by Holl for Stanhope's 'Life.' Other engravings are by Bartolozzi, from a portrait by G. du Pont, by J. Jones, Sherwin, Gillray, Edridge, and by Cardon in Cifford's Life, after the bust by Flaxman (STANHOPE, iv. 398-9 and note O; BROMLEY, Catalogue of Engraved Portraits, sec. ix. p. 3).

Pitt was tall and slight, and dignified, though rather stiff, in carriage. His countsnance was animated by the brightness of his eyes. In his later years his hair became almost white, and his face bore the marks of disease, anxiety, and indulgence in port wine. The habit was acquired early through a doctor's recommendation, and he made no serious effort to break it. He was once only seen drunk in the House of Commons (WRANALL, Memoirs, iii. 221). His private life was remarkably pure. His debts were the result in part of his absorption in public affairs, and in part of a culpable contempt for private economy, inherited from his father. To all not on intimate terms with him, his manners were cold and even repellent. The mass of his supporters, who admired and obeyed him, were not drawn to him personally. Men of the highest rank found him stiff and unbending; and the king, though he esteemed him, looked on him as a master, and felt far more comfortable with Addington. His intimate friends were few; they were ardently attached to him, to them he was warm-hearted and affectionate, and in their company was cheerful and gay. He loved children, and enjoyed romping with them. He exercised a special charm over younger men, who found him sympathetic and inspiring. Eager by nature, he trained himself to a singular degree of calmness and self-possession. Greatness of soul enabled him to rise above calamity and, conscious of his powers, to remain undismayed by defeat. His temper was rarely ruffled, but he did not easily forgive those who offended him. While he retained through life his delight in Greek and Roman literature, and appreciated elegant English writing, he did not approach Fox either in classical scholarship or knowledge of literature generally. In office he offered no reward either to literature or art -a course which, if not matter for reproach, proved impolitic. As an orator, he spoke more correctly than Fox, expressed his meaning with less effort, and was far more master of himself. The best word always seemed to come spontaneously to his lips; he never stormed, his speeches were lucid, and his handling of his subject always complete. His memory was good, and he seldom used notes. He excelled in sarcasm, and used it freely. While Fox persuaded his hearers, Pitt commanded their assent; his speeches appealed to reason, and breathed the lofty sentiments of the speaker. His voice was rich, but its tone lacked modulation; his action was vehement and ungraceful. His judgment in party matters was admirable, and was conspicuously shown in his refusal of office in 1782, in his use of Fox's mistakes, and his conduct of affairs in 1784 and 1788-1789, and in his readiness to withdraw taxes that were generally obnoxious. Constantly needing the help of men of the higher classes, he paid for it with honours that cost the country nothing. He thus almost doubled the number of the House of Lords, and destroyed the whig oligarchy which, during the earlier years of the reign, had become intolerable (Roshbury, pp. 275-7). He showed remarkable foresight in declaring, during his last days, that a national war beginning in Spain might even then save Europe (ib. p. 256); but in one or two notable instances, such as his belief that the war with France would be short, his prescience was at fault. He made some serious political mistakes. A sanguine tendency to resort, in the face of difficulties, to a policy of vagueness, probably accounts for the Fitzwilliam imbroglio, and is to be discovered in his hopes about Fox in 1804, and his promises to Sidmouth. He acted unwisely in not speaking earlier to the king about his intention respecting catholic emancipation; and his pledge to abandon the question during the king's lifetime, though well-intentioned, is not to be defended. At times his conduct was inconsistent. Hisattitude towards Addington's ministry, though dictated by a sense of honour, was inspired by no intelligible principle. He honestly strove in 1804 to persuade the king to consent to a comprehensive government; but he allowed the king's wishes to outweigh his judgment a in a matter which clearly involved the country's best interests.

As a peace minister Pitt aimed at extending the franchise and purifying elections. Supported by the crown, and yet acting in-dependently, he destroyed the whig oligarchy, and pursued in every direction a policy large and statesmanlike. He strengthened public credit by creating a surplus, established an enlightened system of finance, and brought order into the administration of the revenue. In 1783 the three-per-cents were at 74; in 1792 they were over 96 (NEWMARCH). The success of his commercial policy, which is illustrated by his reduction of customs duties, by his proposals for Ireland, and by his treaty with France, may be estimated by the vast increase in British commerce between the same dates (ROSEBERY, p. 280). He enabled the country to reap the full benefit of the extension of manufactures consequent on the introduction of machinery. Peace was necessary for the fulfilment of his work: war forced him to abandon domestic reforms and to direct his energies as a domestic minister towards stringently exacting from the people, in face of a relentless foe, the fullest adherence to the existing constitution.

As a war minister he has been compared unfavourably with his father. Chatham. however, had not to deal with Bonaparte; his son had no such ally as Frederick the Great. Pitt recognised that England should not engage in a war on land. The war on the continent had to be carried on by the continental powers, and Pitt, by means of his coalitions, strained every nerve to array them against France. The European sovereigns would not stir in the common cause without money, and he had to find it. From 1798 to 1801 8,836,000*l*. was spent in subsidies. This and other expenses of the war he met largely by loans, increasing the public liabilities during the period by 384,525,4861., though from this must be deducted the large amount of debt redeemed by the sinking fund (ib. pp. 150-1). He was forced to borrow at high rates of interest, which made the difference between the money he received and the capital he created 103,000,000l., but he was unwilling to check commercial development by excessive taxation, and his loans employed capital that could not in any case have been used in trade. Pitt's coalitions failed of their purpose, but it was not his fault that the sovereigns of Europe were jealous, selfish, and short-sighted.

He held that it was the part of Great Britain to check French aggrandisement by making herself mistress of the sea. Βv striking at France in the West Indies, and by rigidly restraining the trade of neutrals, he inflicted a severe blow on the enemy and vastly enlarged the resources of his own country. The commerce of France was ruined. The British navy, which was increased 82 per cent. between 1792 and 1800 (MAHAN, ii. 404), was everywhere victorious, and controlled the trade of the world. Between 1793 and 1799 the average value of British imports as compared with the preceding six years rose by upwards of three and a half millions, that of the exports of British merchandise by nearly two and a half, and of foreign merchandise by nearly five and a half millions (NUWMARCH; Rose-BERY). On the progress of this increase, and the progressive decline in the enemy's trade, Pitt constantly insisted in his speeches, and these results should weigh for much in an estimate of his policy as a war minister. It was well for this country and for Europe that in the period of her deepest need Great Britain was guided by his wisdom and animated by his lofty courage. He lived for his country, was worn out by the toils, anxieties, and vexations that he encountered, and died crushed in body, though not in spirit, by the disaster that wrecked his plans for the security of England and the salvation of Europe,

Besides the tragedy and the answer to Lord Macartney noticed above, Pitt wrote the articles on finance in the 'Anti-Jacobin,' Nos. i., ii., xii., and x.v., and in No. xxxv. the 'Review of the Session.' He was also responsible for a verse of the 'University of Gottingen,' a translation of Horacs, Odo iii. 2, and a few other lines of verse.

Lives of Pitt have been published by Gifford (i.e. John Richards Green [q. v.]) as a History of Pitt's Political Life (3 vols. 4to, 1809), verbose, once useful, but superseded; by Bishop Tombne (formerly Pietyman) (3 vols. 8vo. 1822), goes down to 1798, and is so far useful; by Lord Stanhope (4 vols. 8vo, 2nd ed. 1862), the standard 'Life,' written with much care, and defending Pitt throughout; by Lewis Sergeant in Engl. Political Leaders Ser (8vo, 1882), a fair hand-book; and by Lord Rosebery in the 'Twelve English Statesmen 'Ser. (8vo, 1891), a masterly and interesting study. For general views of Pitt's career, see Brougham's Sketches of Statesmen, 1st ser. vol. ii. (12mo, 1845), a poor production; Macaulay's Essay on William Pitt, written for Encycl. Brit. 1859, and included in Miscellaneous Writings (8vo, 1860, 1889); Sir George Cornewall Lewis's Essays on the Administrations of Great Britain (8vo, 1864), extremely valuable; Mr. Goldwin Smith's Three English Statesmen, 1867, 8vo, and The Two Mr. Pitts in Macmillan's Magazine, August 1800;

also an art. by Mr. Lecky on Pitt in Macmillan. February 1891. For notices of early life: Chatham Correspondence, ed. Taylor (4 vols. 8vo, 1840); Pitt's Speeches (1 vols. 8vo, 1806); see also Parl. Hist. and Parl. Deb. and Ann. Reg. sub ann. For notices in Memoirs, &c.: Fitzmaurice's Life of Shelburne (3 vols. 8vo, 1875); Lord Albemarle's Memorrs of the Marquis of Rockingham (2 vols. 8vo, 1852); R. I. and S. Wilberforce's Life of W. Wilberforce (5 vols. 12mo, 1838) which contains many valuable notices, and is specially interesting as witnessing to Wilberforce's friendship for William Pitt; Russell's Memorials of C. J. Fox (4 vols. 8vo, 1858-7) and Life of C. J. Fox (3 vols. 8vo, 1859); Diaries and Corresp. of first Earl of Malmesbury (4 vols. 8vo, 1844); Holland's Mam. of the Whig Party (2 vols. 1854); Rose's Diaries and Corresp. ed. Harcourt (2 vols. 8vo, 1860); Lord Auckland's Journal and Corresp. (4 vols. 8vo, 1866); Grenville's Court and Cabinets of George III (4 vols. 8vo, 1855) which contains important notices of private negotiations; Pellew's Life of Sidmouth (3 vols. 8vo, 1847) which presents an ex parte view of William Pitt's relations with Addington; Lord Colchester's (Abbot) Duary and Corresp. ed. Colchester (8 vols. 8vo, 1861) on Addington's side; Windham's Diary, ed. Baring (8vo, 1866); L. Horner's Life of F. Horner (2 vols. 8vo, 1853); Twiss's Life of Eldon (2 vols. 2nd ed. 1846); Wraxell's Hist. and Posth. Memoirs (5 vols. 8vo, 1884); Moore's Life of Sheridan (2 vols. 8vo, 1825), Yonge's Life of Lord Liverpool (3 vols. 8vo, 1868); Letters and Corresp. of Bland Burges, ed. Hutton (8vo, 1886); Bruce's Life of Sir W. Napier (2 vols. 8vo, 1864) which has some interesting personal reminiscences in vol i. For negotiations with France, 1792-3, see Marsh's Hist. of Politicks (2 vols. 8vo, 1800); Ernouf's Maret, Duc do Bassano (8vo, 1878); W. A. Miles's Corresp. on the French Revolution (2 vols. 1890); Browning's England and France in 1793 in Fortnightly Review, February 1883. For Pitt's public economy and finance: Dowell's Hist, of Taxation (4 vols. 8vo, 2nd ed. 1888); Tooke's Hist. of Prices (8vo, 1858); Bastable's Public Finance (8vo, 1802); Collection of Tracts on the National Debt, by McCalloch, specially the last tract by Hamilton on the Sinking Fund and the Debt (8vo, 1867); Speech by Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons on 8 May 1854, in Parl. Deb. 3rd ser. vol. cxxxii, cols. 1472-9, containing an attack on Pitt's finance during the war, which is ably defended in Newmarch's On the Loans raised by Mr. Pitt, 1793-1801 (8vo, 1855), criticised in Rickard's Financial Policy of War (8vo, 1855). For Pitt's attitude to constitutional questions, see Erskine May's Constitutional Hist., 1760-1860. For the expedition of 1705: Forneron's Histoire Générale des Émigrés (2 vols. 2nd ed. 1884). For dealings with Ireland : Fitzpatrick's Secret Service under Pitt (8vo, 1892) contains little personal information; Stewart's [Marquis of Londonderry] Mem. and Corr. of Viscount Castlereagh (12 vols. 8vo, 1848), for this purpose vols. i -iv.; Cornwallis's Corr. (3 vols. 8vo, 1859) has also other important notices of William Pitt; Corresp. between W. Pitt and Charles, Duke of Rutland, 1890; Grattan's Life of Grattan (5 vols. 8vo, 1839); Grattan's Speeches (4 vols. 8vo, 1822); Cooto's Hist. of the Union (8vo, 1802); Lecky's Leaders of Public Opinion in Iroland, 1861; Ingram's Hist. of the Irish Union (8vo, 1887); above all, Lecky's Hist. of England, vols. vi.-viii. For satirical writing on Pitl's side: Spirit of the Public Journals, 1802-1804, see list of Canning's verses in Lewis's Administrations, p. 249; the Anti-Jacobin. Against Pitt: Wolcot's [Peter Pindar] Works (5 vols. 8vo, 1812); Morris's Lyra Urbanica (2 vols. 12mo, 1840). For caricatures, see Works of James Gillray, and in Wright's Caricature History of the Georges (8vo, 1868). For accounts of William Pitt in general histories: Lecky's Hist. of England in the Eighteenth Century (8 vols. 8vo, 1882-90), vols. iv.-viii.; Mahan's Influence of Sea Power on the French Revolution, 1793-1812 (2 vols. 8vo, 1892), which contains a fine defence of Pitt's war policy, specially with reference to naval operations; Adolphus's Hist, of England (7 vols. 8vo, 1845) ends at 1803; Alison's Hist. of Europe (12 vols. 9th ed. 8vo, 1853), vols. ii.-v.]

PITT, WILLIAM (1749-1823), writer on agriculture, was born at Tettenhall, near Wolverhampton, in 1749. He was one of the mostable of those employed by the board of agriculture in the preparation of the reports on the different counties. He lived first at Pendeford, near Wolverhampton, but removed afterwards to Edgbaston, Birmingham. He died on 18 Sept. 1823, and was buried at Tettenhall. He published: 1. 'A General View of the Agriculture of the County of Stafford, with Observations on the Means of its Improvement,' London, 1794, 4to; 1796, 4to; 1808, 8vo; 1815, 8vo. 2. Similar reports on the agriculture of Northamptonshire, 1809, 8vo; Worcostershire, 1818,8vo; and Leicestershire, to which is annexed 'A Survey of the County of Rutland. By Richard Parkinson' (1748-1815) [q. v.], London, 1809, 8vo. 8. 'On Agricultural Political Arithmetic' (Essay xxi. in Hunter's 'Georgical Essays,' vol. iv., York, 1808, 8vo). 4. 'The Bullion Debate,' a seriocomic satiric poem, London, 1811, 8vo. 5. 'A Comparative Statement of the Food produced from Arable and Grass Land, and the Returns arising from each; with Remarks on the late Enclosures,' &c., London, 1812, 4to. 6. 'A Topographical History of Staffordshire,' &c., Newcastle-under-Lyne, 1817, 8vo.

[Donaldson's Agricultural Biography, p. 74; Loudon's Encyclopædia of Agriculture, p. 1210; Simms's Bibliotheca Staffordiensis, p. 361.] W. A. S. H. PITTARROW, Lord (d. 1576), Scottish judge. [See Wishart, Sir John.]

PITTENDREICH, Lord (d. 1583), Scottish judge. [See Balfour, Sir James,]

PITTIS, THOMAS (1686-1687), divine, son of Thomas Pittis, a captain of militia in the Isle of Wight, by his wife Mary, was born at Niton, where his family had lived for several generations. He was baptised on 28 June 1636. In 1652 he entered as a commoner at Trinity College, Oxford, but migrated to Lincoln College, whence he matriculated on 29 April 1658, graduating B.A. on 15 June 1656, M.A. on 29 June 1658, B.D. in 1665, and D.D. in 1670. Wood says he was 'esteemed by his contemporaries a tolerable disputant; but, his speech being disliked by the godly party of those times, he was expelled from the university in 1658.' He was presented, before March 1660, by John Worsley of Gatcombe, to the rectory of Newport, Isle of Wight. In 1665 he was presented to the living of Holyrood, or St. Cross, Southampton, where his strong royalist sympathies brought him into conflict with the mayor and corporation (cf. A Private Conference between a Rich Alderman and a Poor Country Vicar made Public, 1670). He was appointed one of the king's chaplains and lecturers at Christ Church, Newgate Street, about 1670, and in 1677 was also presented by Charles II to the rectory of Lutterworth, Leicestershire, but was removed in 1678 to the rectory of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate. Here he remained until his death, on 28 Dec. 1687. He was buried at Niton. A slab was placed in his memory in St. Botolph's chancel by his wife, who survived him. He married, on 4 Feb. 1661, in Gatcombe church, Elizabeth, daughter of William Stephens of Newport, and sister of Sir William Stephens, knight, of Burton, Isle of Wight. By her he left two sons: Thomas, born in 1669, vicar of Warnham, Sussex, and William, noticed below; with two daughters: Elizabeth, who married Zacheus Isham [q. v.], Pittis's succossor at St. Botolph's; and Catherine.

Besides separate sermons Pittis published two 'discourses': (1) 'Concerning the Trial of Spirits,' London, 1683, 8vo; the other 'Of Prayer,' London, 1683, 8vo.

WILLIAM PITTIS (1674–1724), the second son, entered Winchester School in 1687, matriculated at New College, Oxford, on 14 Aug. 1690, graduated B.A. 1694, and was fellow of his college 1692–5. He was afterwards a member of the Inner Temple. On 27 April 1706 he was ordered by the court of queen's bench to stand in the pillory three times and to pay a fine of one hundred marks for writing a 'Memorial of the Church of England,' which James Drake Poley, the member for ticipation in church services. In 1858 he set Ipswich, and others were accused of having a hand [see art. DRAKD, JAMES]. On 3 Dec. 1714 he was again in custody for writing 'Reasons for a War with France.' He died at his chambers in the Inner Temple, over the crown office, in November 1724. He was author of an epistolary poem 'To John Dryden on the death of James, Earl of Abingdon, 1699; an elegy 'On the death of Sir Cloudesley Shovel' (1708) is in manuscript (Addit. MS. 23904, f. 516). He also wrote: 1. 'The History of the present Parliament and Convocation, with the Debates on the conduct of the War abroad,' &c., London, 1711, 8vo. 2. 'The History of the Proceedings of the Second Session of Parliament, London [1712 f], 8vo. 8. 'The History of the Third Session' [1713]. 4. 'Memoirs of the Life of John Radcliffe, M.D.' [q.v.], 1715, 8vo; 3rd edit. 1716; 4th edit. 1736. 5. 'The Proceedings of both Houses of Parliament . . . upon the Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity,' London,' 1710, 8vo, signed 'W. P.'

[For the father see Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Hearne's Collections, i. 100; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. iv. 220; Wood's Fasti, ed. Bliss, ii. 192, 214, 282, 320; Kennett's Register, pp. 920, 925; Newcourt's Repert. 1. 313-14; Westminster Abbey Registers (Harl. Soc.), 279; Registers of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, published in Hallen's London City Church Registers, pt. i. pp. 499–502, pt. 11. p. 271; Nichols's Collections for Leicestershire, pp. 494, 1141, Woodward's Hist. of Hampshire, Suppl. (Isle of Wight), pp. 59, 67n, 68n. For the son, Kirby's Winchester Scholars, p. 208; Hearne's Collections, ed. Doble, i. 235, PITTMAN, JOSIAH (1816-1886), musician and author, the son of a musician, was born on 3 Sept. 1816. Ho studied the organ under Goodman and S. S. Wesley. Subsequently he took lessons in the pianoforte from Moscheles and in composition from Schnyder von Wartensee at Frankfort. In 1831 he was appointed organist at the parish church of Sydenham, and in 1883 he obtained a like office at Tooting; from 1835 to 1847 he was organist at Spitalfields, and from 1852 to 1864 at Lincoln's Inn (GROVE). He composed many services and much sacred music, some of which he published in 1850. A close study of the requirements of the established church with regard to congregational singing or chanting led him to the conclusion that the Book of Common Prayer was made 'for song and naught else.' He deplored the absence of music from the psalter as originally framed, and the consequent diswhich had been published in 1704, and in couragement of the people from active parforth these views in 'The People in Church.' This was followed in 1859 by 'The People in the Cathedral, mainly an historical trea-

> In 1865 he became accompanist at Her Majesty's Opera, and from 1868 until his death he filled the same office at Covent Garden. The value of his musical work at the opera was best understood by those behind the scenes, while his literary abilities fitted him to assist in the translation of libretti. The series of operas in pianoforte score published as 'The Royal Edition' by Messrs. Boosey, ranging from Auber through the alphabet to Weber, were edited by Pittman, who again, in co-operation with Sullivan, selected the operatic songs for the popular 'Royal Edition' albums issued by the same publishers. Pittman also edited a volume of Bach's Fugues, and the musical portions of theoretical works by Cherubini, Marx, Callcott, and others. 'Songs of Scotland,' compiled by Colin Brown and Pittman, was published in > Pittman died suddenly, in his seventieth year, at 228 Piccadilly, on Good Friday, 23 April 1886.

> [Grove's Dict. ii. 759, iv. 749; Musical Standard, 1886, p. 270; Musical Times, 1886, p. 228; Times, 29 April 1886; Pittman's comp. 228; 111100, 20 Apr. pilations in the Brit, Museum Library.] L. M. M.

> PITTS, JOSEPH (1663-1785?), traveller, was born at Exeter in 1663, and in the spring of 1678 sailed as an apprentice on board the Speedwell, a merchantman bound for the West Indies, 'Newfoundland, Bilboa, the Canaries, and so home.' On her return journey the vessel was captured off the Spanish coast by an Algerine pirate, commanded by a Dutch renegado. Pitts was taken to Algiers and sold to a merchant, by whom he was treated with great barbarity. Beyond a formal summons to change his faith, however, no attempt was made to convert him to Islamism. In 1680 Pitts changed hands, and his second master, or 'patroon,' was of a different mind. He tortured the unfortunate Pitts by belabouring his feet with a cudgel until they were suffused with blood, and choking his cries by ramming his heel into his mouth, until his victim repeated the required formula of submission to Mahomet. A few months afterwards, in attendance upon this patroon, he made the pilgrimage to Mecca, sailing to Alexandria, thence by caravan to Cairo (of which he gives a very graphic account) and Suez, and so by ship to Jeddah, the port of

At Alexandria the genuineness of his conversion was tested by his being blindfolded and told to walk a distance of ten paces to the stump of a tree, said to be the fig-tree that was blasted by the curse of Jesus Christ. He succeeded in stumbling against the tree, and was accounted to have passed the ordeal with credit. Shortly after his return to Algiers, he went to Tunis, where he heard news from England and sought to obtain the means of ransom from the English consul. The latter was prepared to advance 60%, but his patroon would take no less than 100l. Later he passed into the hands of a third master, by whom he was kindly treated and finally manumitted. He remained in his service as a supercarge until 1693, when he succeeded in effecting his escape in a French vessel to Leghorn, through the agency of William Raye, the English consul at Smyrna. From Leghorn he accomplished the journey home on foot by way of Florence, Augsburg, Frankfort, Mainz, Cologne, Rotterdam, and Helvoetsluys. From Helvoetsluys he sailed to Harwich, where, upon the first night of his return, he was impressed for the navy. He obtained his release with difficulty through the agency of Sir William Falkener, a prominent Turkey merchant, with whom he had had dealings in the Levant. He then proceneded to Exoter, where he was welcomed by his father early in 1691, and was greatly relieved to find that his opportunism in adopting the creed of Islam had been condoned by his father's spiritual advisors. among them his old preceptor, Joseph Hallett (1656-1722) [q. v.] He was living in Exeter in May 1731, aged 68; but the date of his death has not been ascertained.

In 1704 Pitts published, in 8vo, at Exeter, 'A Faithfull Account of the Religion and Manners of the Mahometans, in which is a particular Relation of their Pilgrimage to Mecca.' This work (of which Gibbon seems to have been ignorant) is the first authentic record by an Englishman of the pilgrimage to Mecca. It gives a brief but sensible and consistent account of what the writer saw. A second edition of the 'Faithful Account' appeared at Exeter in 1717, 12mo; and a third, dedicated to Peter King, first lord King [q. v.], with additions and corrections, in 1731, 12mo. To this edition were added a 'map of Mecca' (more exactly a plan of the temple and Ka'abah) and 'a cut of the gestures of the Mahometans in their worship.' Pitts's narrative was also reprinted in vol. avii. of 'The World displayed' (1778), and as an appendix to Honry Maundrell's 'Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem' (London, 1810).

[Pitts's Faithful Account; Burton's Pilgrimage to Mecca, 1893, ii. 358 sq.; Crichton's Arabia, ii. 203; Quarterly Review, xlii. 20; Dublin Univ. Mag. xxvii. 76, 213; Athenæum, 1893, n. 697.]

PITTS, WILLIAM (1790-1840), silverchaser and sculptor, born in 1790, was son of a silver-chaser, to whom he was apprenticed as a boy. In 1812 he obtained the gold Isis medal from the Society of Arts for modelling, He chased a portion of the 'Wellington Shield' designed by Thomas Stothard [q. v.] for Messra. Green & Ward, and the whole of the 'Shield of Achilles designed by John Flaxman [q. v.] for Messrs. Rundell & Bridge. In later life he modelled, in imitation of these, a 'Shield of Æneas,' and a 'Shield of Hercules' from Hesiod, but only a portion of the former was carried out in silver. Pitts had a very prolific imagination, and gained a great reputation for models and reliefs in pure classical taste. In 1830 he executed the bas-reliefs in the bow-room and drawing-rooms at Buckingham Palace. He exhibited many of his models at the Royal Academy. He made two designs for the Nelson monument, though he was not successful in the competition. He made innumerable designs for plates; the greater part of the épergnes, candelabra, &c., for presentation at this time were designed, modelled, or chased by Pitts. He was ambidextrous, drawing and modelling equally well with either hand, and in the latter art sometimes using both at once. He was a good draughtsman, and also tried his hand at painting. He executed for publication a series of outline illustrations to 'Virgil,' of which only two numbers were published, and also a series of illustrations to 'Ossian,' of which two were engraved in mezzotint, but never published. He made similar drawings to illustrate Horace and the 'Bacchee' and 'Ion' of Euripides.

Pitts suffered from depression caused by professional disappointments, and committed suicide on 16 April 1840 by taking laudanum at his residence, 5 Watkins Terrace, Pimlico. He married at the age of nineteen, and left five children, of whom one son, Joseph Pitts, attained some distinction as a sculptor, and in 1846 executed the bust of Robert Stephenson, now in the National Portrait Gallery.

[Gent. Mag. 1840, i. 661; Graves's Dict. of Artists, 1760–1893; Times, 21 April 1840.] L. O.

PIX, Mrs. MARY (1666-1720?), dramatist, born in 1666 at Nettlebed in Oxfordshire, was daughter of the Rev. Roger Griffith, vicar of that place. Her mother, whose , descent from the 'very considerable family of the Wallis's.' In the dedication of 'The Spanish Wives' Mrs. Pix speaks of meeting Colonel Tipping 'at Soundess,' or Sound-ness. This house, which was close to Nettlebed, was the property of John Wallis, eldest son of the mathematician. Mary Griffith's father died before 1684, and on 24 July in that year she married in London, at St. Saviour's, Benetfink, George Pix (b. 1660), a merchant tailor of St. Augustine's parish. His family was connected with Hawkhurst, Kent. By him she had one child, who was buried at Hawkhurst in 1090.

1275

It was in 1696, in which year Colley Cibber, Mrs. Manley, Catharine Cockburn (Mrs. Trotter), and Lord Lansdowne also made their débuts, that Mrs. Pix first came into public notice. She produced at Dorset Garden, and then printed, a blank-verse tragedy of 'Ibrahim, the Thirteenth Emperor of the Turks.' When it was too late, she discovered that she should have written 'Ibrahim the Twelfth.' This play she dedicated to the Hon. Richard Minchall of Bourton, a neighbour of her country days. In the same year (1696) Mary Pix published a novel, 'The Inhuman Cardinal,' and a farce, 'The Spanish Wives,' which had enjoyed a very considerable success at Dorset Garden. From this point she devoted herself to dramatic authorship with more activity than had been shown before her time by any woman except Mrs. Afra Behn [q. v.]. In 1697 she produced at Little Lincoln's Inn Fields, and then published, a comedy of 'The Innocent Mistress.' This play, which was very successful, shows the influence of Congreve upon the author, and is the most readable of her productions. The prologue and epilogue were written by Peter Anthony Motteux [q. v.] It was followed the next year by 'The Deceiver Deceived,' a comedy which failed, and which involved the poetess in a quarrel. She accused George Powell [q. v.], the actor, of having seen the manuscript of her play, and of having stolen from it in his 'Imposture Defeated.' On 8 Sept. 1698 an anonymous 'Letter to Mr. Congreve' was published in the interests of Powell, from which it would seem that Congreve had by this time taken Mary Pix under his protection, with Mrs. Trotter, and was to be seen very gravely with his hat over his eyes...together with the two she-things called Poetesses ' (see Gosse, Life of Congreve, pp. 123-5). Her next play was a tragedy of 'Queen Catharine,' brought out at Lincoln's Inn, and published in 1698. Mrs. Trotter wrote the epilogue. In her own prologue lected in her own age, nor have they been maiden name was Lucy Berriman, claimed Mary Pix pays a warm tribute to Shakespeare. 'The False Friend' followed, at the same house, in 1699; the title of this comedy was borrowed three years later by Vanbrugh.

Hitherto Mary Pix had been careful to put her name on her title-pages or dedica-tions; but the comedy of 'The Beau De-feated'—undated, but published in 1700 though anonymous, is certainly hers. In 1701 she produced a tragedy of 'The Double Distress.' Two more plays have been attri-buted to Mary Pix by Downes. One of these is 'The Conquest of Spain,'an adaptation from Rowley's 'All'slost by Lust,' which was brought out at the Queen's theatre in the Haymarket, ran for six nights, and was printed anonymously in 1705 (Downe, Roscius Anglicanus, p. 48). Finally, the comedy of the 'Adventures in Madrid' was acted at the same house with Mrs. Bracegirdle in the cast, and printed anonymously and without date. It has been attributed by the historians of the drama to 1709; but a copy in the possession of the present writer has a manuscript note of date of publication '10 August 1706.'

Nearly all our personal impression of Mary Pix is obtained from a dramatic satire entitled 'The Female Wits; or, the Triumvirate of Poets.' This was acted at Drury Lane Theatre about 1697, but apparently not printed until 1704, after the death of the author, Mr. W. M. It was directed at the three women who had just come forward as competitors for dramatic honours— Mrs. Pix, Mrs. Manley, and Mrs. Trotter see COCKBURN, CATHARINE]. Mrs. Pix, who is described as 'a fat Female Author, a good, sociable, well-natur'd Companion, that will not suffer Martyrdom rather than take off three Bumpers in a Hand,' was travestied by Mrs. Powell under the name of 'Mrs. Wellfed.'

The style of Mrs. Pix confirms the statements of her contemporaries that though, as she says in the dedication of the 'Spanish Wives, she had had an inclination to poetry from childhood, she was without learning of any sort. She is described as 'foolish and open-hearted,' and as being ' big enough to be the Mother of the Muses.' Her fatness and her love of good wine were matters of notoriety. Her comedies, though coarse, are far more decent than those of Mrs. Behn, and her comic bustle of dialogue is sometimes entertaining. Her tragedies are intolerable. She had not the most superficial idea of the way in which blank verse should be written, pompous prose, broken irregularly into lengths, being her ideal of versification.

The writings of Mary Pix were not colroprinted since. Several of them have become exceedingly rare. An anonymous tragedy, 'The Ozar of Muscovy,' published in 1702, a week after her play of 'The Double Distress,' has found its way into lists of her writings, but there is no evidence identifying it with her in any way. She was, however, the author of 'Violenta, or the Rewards of Virtue, turn'd from Bocacce into Verse,' 1704.

[Miscollanea Genealogica et Heraldica, 2nd ser. v. 110-2; Vicar-Goneral's Marringe Licences (Harl. Soc.), 1679-87, p. 173; Baker's Biogr. Dramatica; Doran's Annals of the English Stage, i. 243; Mrs. Pix's works; Genest's Hist. Account of the Stage.]

PLACE. FRANCIS (1647 - 1728),amateur artist, was fifth son of Rowland Place of Dinsdale, co. Durham, by Catherine, daughter and coheiress of Charles Wise of Copgrove, Yorkshire. His father had been admitted to Gray's Inn on 9 Oct. 1633 (see FOSTER, Gray's Inn Registers), and Place was articled there to an attorney, a profession for which he had no inclination. Owing to the outbreak of the great plague in London in 1605, Place left London, and quitted the law for an artist's life, having great gifts for drawing and engraving. He was a personal friend of Wonceslaus Hollar [q. v.], the engraver; but, though he modellod his style of drawing and engraving on that of Hollar, he said himself that he was not his pupil. Place took up his residence in the manor-house close to St. Mary's Abbey at York. He was an intimate friend of William Lodge [q. v.], Ralph Thoresby [q. v.], and other artists and antiquaries in or near With Lodge he wont many drawing and angling excursions, and during the alarm of popery caused by Oates's plot the pair were on one occasion taken up and put into Place had considerable merit as a prison. painter of animals and still life, and also drew portraits in crayons; among his crayon portraits is one which is probably the only authentic likeness of the famous William Penn. He etched a number of landscapes, marine or topographical subjects, including a valuable set of views of the observatory at Greenwich, and a view of St. Winifred's Well. Some of his plates were done for the publications of his friends, such as Thoresby's 'Ducatus Leodiensis' and Drake's 'Eboracum.' Place also etched several sets of birds and animals after Francis Barlow, and the plates to Godartius's 'Book of Insects.' He was one of the first Englishmen, if not the very first, to practise the newly discovered art of mezzotint-engraving, and left several interesting examples, including portraits of Sir Ralph Cole, Nathaniel Crew (bishop of Durban), Archbishop Sterne, and his friends II my Gyles, the glass-painter, William Lodge, John Moyser of Beverley, Yorkshire, Pierce Tempest and Richard Tompson the print-sellers, and Philip Woolrich. Most of these engrav-ings are very rare. A good collection of Place's drawings (chiefly of Yorkshire topography) and engravings is in the print-room of the British Museum. Place lived for forty years at York, where he also made some experiments in the manufacture of pottery, producing a grey ware with black streaks of which a few specimens have been preserved. Place died on 21 Sept. 1728, in his eighty-second year, and was buried in St. Olave's Church Without at York. He married, on 5 Sept. 1093, Ann Wilkinson, by whom he had three daughters, one of whom, Frances, was married to Wadham Wyndham. Upon his death his widow left the manor-house at York, where Place had resided, and disposed of a number of his paintings. He drew his own portrait, and another was painted by Thomas Murray.

[Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting, ed. Wornum; Chalmers's Biogr. Dict. xxv. 32; Vertue's Diaries (Brit. Mus. Add. MS. 23070, f. 25); Surtees's Hist. of Durham, iii. 237; Durham Visitation l'adigrees (Harl. Soc. Publ.); Dayies's York Press; Thoresby's Diary and Corresp.] L. C.

PLACE, FRANCIS (1771-1854), radical reformer, was born on 8 Nov. 1771. His father, Simon Place, was an energetic but dissipated man who had begun life as a working baker, and was in 1771 a bailiff to the Marshalsen court and keeper of a 'sponging house' in Vinegar Yard, Drury Lane. Place was sent to various schools near Fleet Street and Drury Lane from his fifth till his fourteenth year. His father (who had meanwhile taken a public-house) desired to apprentice him to a conveyancer, but the boy preferred to learn a trade, and was accordingly bound, before he was fourteen years old, to a leatherbreeches maker. In 1780 he became an independent journeyman, and in 1791 married Elizabeth Chadd (he being nineteen years old and she not quite seventeen), and set up house in one room in a court off the Strand. Hitherto Place had lived rather an irregular life, but now he became rigidly economical and industrious. Leather-breeches making, however, was a decaying trade, and he had great difficulty in obtaining work. In 1798 the London leather-breeches makers struck, and Place was chosen as organiser. strike having failed, Place was refused work by the masters, and for eight months suffered extreme privation. It is a singular proof of his resolute character that during those months he studied laboriously such books on mathematics, law, history, and economics, as he could get access to. He became secretary to his trade club, and in 1794, during another period of slack work, was secretary for several other trade clubs of carpenters, plumbers, and other workmen.

In 1794 he also joined the London Corresponding Society, whose secretary, Thomas Hardy (1752–1832) [q.v.], had just been arrested. After Hardy's acquittal on a charge of high treason, the society rapidly increased, and in May 1795 it had seventy London branches, with an average weekly attendance of over two thousand. Place was at that time the usual chairman at the weekly meetings of the general committee of the society (see the original minute-book, Brit. Mus. Add. MS. 27813). But after the passing of the 'Pitt and Grenville Acts' in November and Decemher 1705, the corresponding society quickly declined. Place, who had always belonged to the moderate party on the committee, resigned in 1797, in consequence of the tactics of the more violent members. In 1798 all the remaining members of the committee, including Place's friend, Colonel Edward Marcus Despard [q. v.], were arrested and kept in prison without trial for three years. During that period Place managed the collection and distribution of subscriptions for their families.

Meanwhile Place was not only improving his education, but was building up a connection with customers of his own, and gaining credit with the wholesale dealers. In 1709 he and a partner opened a tailor's shop at 29 Charing Cross, but after about a year the partnership was broken up, and Place moved to a new shop of his own at 16

Charing Cross.

He now gave up politics and devoted himself entirely to his business, reading, however, for two or three hours every evening after work was over. The shop was from the first extremely successful, and in 1816 he cleared, he says, over 3,000%. He had a large family, fifteen children being born to him between 1792 and 1817; five of them died in infancy.

In 1807 Place returned to political life, and took a leading part during the general election of that year in bringing forward Sir Francis Burdott [q. v.] as an independent candidate for Westminster. Burdett was put at the head of the poll without cost to himself, and after an unprecedentedly small expenditure by the committee.

For the next three years Place seems to have kept pretty closely to his business, but from 1810 onwards his time was more and more taken up by public affairs. When Burdett (April 1810) barricaded his house in order to resist the warrant committing him to the Tower, Place attempted to bring the sheriff and a body of constables to his help. When Burdett was released (21 June 1810), Place organised a great procession, which, however, was stultified by Burdett's absence. Burdett and Place quarrelled over this incident, and did not speak to each other for the next nine years.

Meanwhile Place was becoming known to the political thinkers as well as to the politicians of the time. In 1810 William Godwin the elder [q. v.] sought his acquaintance, and borrowed money of him at intervals till Place threw him off in 1814. About the same time Place began a long friendship with James Mill (1773-1836) [q. v.], who used to call at Charing Cross on his journeys between Stoke Newington and Bentham's house in Queen's Square Place. In 1813 Robert Owen [q. v.] came to London, and Place helped him to put his essays on the 'Formation of Character' into shape. In 1812 Place met Bentham, and from 1814 used to write long weekly letters of London news to Mill and Bentham during their visits to Ford Abbey. Since 1804 Place had regularly subscribed to the educational schemes of Joseph Lancaster [q. v.], and in 1818 he helped to organise the West London Lancasterian Association. When the Royal Lancasterian Society became the British and Foreign School Society, Place was put upon the committee. But Burdett's ill-will and Place's notoriously 'infidel' opinions made his position in both societies difficult, and he left the West London committee in 1814 and the British and Foreign committee in 1815.

In 1817 Place prepared to give over his business to his eldest son, and went to stay some months with Bentham and Mill at Ford Abbey. Here he occupied himself in learning Latin grammar, and in putting together 'Not Paul, but Jesus,' from Bentham's notes. Sir Samuel Romilly [q. v.], who met him at Ford Abbey, wrote to Dumont: 'Place is a very extraordinary person. . . . He is self-educated, has learned a great deal, has a very strong natural understanding, and possesses great influence in Westminster—such influence as almost to determine the elections for members of parliament. I need hardly say that he is a great admirer and disciple of Bentham's '(BAIN, Life of James Mill, p. 78).

Romilly was elected for Westminster in 1818, but Place, who was always a bitter opponent of the official whig party, did not support him. After Romilly's death, Place helped John Cum Hobhouse [q. v.], afterwards baron Broughton, as an independent reformer against George Lamb, Lord Melbourne's brother, the whig candidate. Lamb beat Hobhouse in February 1819, but was beaten by him in the general election of 1820. Cam Hobhouse made a proposition or a special carrier of the control of Joseph Hume was introduced to Place by Mill about 1812, and Place used afterwards to collect much of the materials on which Humo founded his laborious parliamentary activity. The library behind the shop at 16 Charing Cross (where Place had gathered a splendid collection of books, pamphlets, and parliamentary papers) was a regular resort of the reformers in and out of parliament. An informal publishing business was carried on there by means of occasional subscriptions. Mill's essays from the supplement to the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' and many tracts by Place and others were thus issued. Place sometimes wrote forcibly and well, but the greater part of the tracts, newspaper articles, and unpublished letters and manuscripts which he left behind him are diffuse, and often almost unroadably dull. His only published book is 'The Principles of Population' (1822), a reply to Godwin's 'Enquiry,' which contains some of his best work. He wrote two articles in the 'Westminster Roview,' which are both in his dullest manner.

Place was more successful as a practical politician. He was no speaker, and disliked publicity; but he was untiring in providing members of parliament and newspaper editors with materials, in drafting petitions, collecting subscriptions, organising agitations, and managing parliamentary committees.

From 1820 to 1830 he was continually gathering facts and arguments on such questions as the libel laws, the Newspaper Stamp Acts, the laws against the freedom of political meetings and associations, the laws of creditor and debtor, the wool laws, the duties on printed cotton, the cutting and From 1816 to 1823 he flaying acts, &c. carried on a campaign against the sinking fund. His groutest triumphs were seen in 1824, when after ten years of almost unaided work, he succeeded in getting the laws against combinations of workmen repealed, and in 1825, when he prevented an intended re-enactment of them (see WIRR, History of Trade Unionism, chap. ii.) By this time Place was beginning to be talked about, and an article in the European Magazine' of March 1820 states: 'No one needs to be told that the whole popular liberties of this country, and, by connection and consequence, of the world, depend upon the electors of Westminster; and just as necessarily as the sinking of lead depends upon its weight, do these electors depend on Mr. Place, not only in the choice of the men whom they intrust as their representatives, but in the

it is said that Sir Francis Burdett or John Cam Hobhouse made a proposition or a speech, thus or thus, there is a misnomer in the assertion; for the proposition or the speech belongs in justice to Mr. Place, and in all that demonstration of frantic freedom-that tumultuary tide of popularity which they propel-he is the influential luminary-the moon which stirs up the waters. . . . Look over the notices of motions, and see when Joseph [Hume] is to storm sixpence laid out in the decoration of a public work, or sack the salary of a clerk in a public office; and when you find that in a day or two it is to astonish St. Stephen's and delight the land, then go, if you can find admission, to the library of this indefatigable statesman, and you will discover him schooling the Nabob liko a baby.

In 1827 Place's first wife died, and he seems, at least for a time, to have estranged many of his friends by his second marriage in 1830. But after the introduction of the Reform Bill in 1831 his library again became the meeting-place of the more extreme reformers, and he and his friend, Joseph Parkes [q. v.], made active preparations during the crisis of May 1832 for the expected civil war. A placard drawn up by Place with the words 'Go for Gold and stop the Duke,' produced a partial run upon the Bank of England, and is said to have been one of the causes which prevented the Duke of Wellington from forming a government (see 'The Story of Eleven Days,' Contemporary Review, 1892).

After the passing of the Reform Bill Place's political influence rapidly declined. Westminster had been partially disfranchised by the 10% clause, and no longer held the peculiar position which as a huge popular constituency it had occupied in the 'boroughmongering' days. Place himself lost the greater part of his fortune through the blunders of his solicitor in 1833, and was compelled to leave Charing Cross and take a house in Brompton Square. He helped, however, Joseph Parkes with the preparation of the municipal corporations report in 1835, and worked furiously, though vainly, to secure the complete abolition of the newspaper stamp at the time of its reduction to one penny in 1880. He and Roebuck published 'Pamphlets for the People' on these and other points in 1835. William Lovett [q. v.] and several other working-class leaders of the early chartist movement in London (1837-8) were his personal friends and disciples, and Place drafted at Lovett's request the 'People's Charter' itself (1888). But when once the chartist movement had begun, his influence over it was small. His individualist political opinions and the neomalthusian propaganda which he had carried on by correspondence and conversation for nearly twenty years made Feargus O'Connor [q. v.], James [Bronterre] O'Brien [q. v.], and the other leaders of the chartists in the northern and midland counties hate him nearly as much as he hated them. At the same time being thoroughly disgusted with the weakness of Lord Melbourne's government after 1835, and with the refusal of the reformers in parliament (with the exception of Roebuck) to take up an independent attitude, he withdrew almost entirely from his parliamentary connection. The years between 1836 and 1839 were mostly spent on a long history of the Reform Bill, which remains (in manuscript) in the British Museum. In 1840 Place joined the Metropolitan Anti-Corn Law Association, and acted for some years as chairman of the weekly business committee. In 1844 he was attacked with what seems to have been a tumour on the brain, and, though he lived for ten more years, his health was always feeble. In 1851 he was separated from his second wife, and died in his eightythird year, 1 Jan. 1854, at a house belonging to his daughters in Hammersmith.

From about 1814 till the time of his death Place carefully kept and indexed his political correspondence. In 1823, on the advice of Bentham, he commenced an autobiography which branched out into a series of long accounts of the corresponding society, the Westminster elections, the repeal of the anticombination laws, and other political events in which he was concerned. All the accounts were illustrated by 'guard books' of documents. Seventy-one volumes of his manuscripts and materials are in the British Museum. The autobiography and letters are in the possession of his family.

It is difficult to convey the impression of almost incredible industry which one derives from a study of Place's manuscripts and correspondence. Through nearly the whole of his long life he began work at six in the morning, and sat often at his desk till late at night. That his political writings are not of greater value may be due partly to the fact that he did not get free from a very laborious and engrossing business till he was nearly fifty years old, partly to the fact that he habitually overworked, and was forced into a tired and mechanical style. His remains form an unequalled mine of information for the social history of this century, but he deserves to be remembered not so much for what he wrote as for what he did, and for the passionate sympathy and indomitable hope which was always the driving force of his activity.

[Place MSS. Brit. Museum, Add MSS. 27789-27859; Principles of Population, 1822, and numerous pamphlets; Place Family papers; Bain's James Mill, pp. 77-9; Robert Owen's Autobiography, vol.i.a, p. 122; Webb's Hist. of Trade Unionism, chap. ii. For contemporary accounts of Place, besides that in the European Magazine (supra), see Chambers's Journal, 26 March 1836; Fraser's Mag. 1 April 1836 (with a portrait by Maclise); Monthly Mag. May 1836 (by 'A. P.' i.e.Richard Carlile); Northern Liberator, 30 Dec. 1837. A good appreciation of his life appeared in the Spectator of 7 Jan. 1854, and another in the Reasoner of 26 March 1834. A Life of Francis Place by Graham Wallas was published in 1898.]

PLAMPIN, ROBERT (1762-1884), viceadmiral, born in 1762, son of John Plampin, of Chadacre Hall, Suffolk, where his family had been settled for more than two centuries, entered the navy in September 1775 on board the Renown, with Captain Francis Banks, and in her was actively engaged on the coast of North America during the opening years of the American war. On the death of Banks he was, in January 1778, discharged into the Chatham for a passage to England, whence, in July, he was sent out to join the Panther at Gibraltar [see DUFF, ROBURT]. In February 1780 he was taken by Sir George Rodney into the Sandwich, and in her was present in the actions of 17 April, 15 and 19 May [see Rodner, George Brydges, LORD]. On 4 July 1780 he was appointed by Rodney acting-lieutenant of the Grafton, and, returning to England in the autumn of 1781, passed his examination on 15 Nov., and was confirmed in the rank of lieutenant on 3 Dec. During the rest of the war he was on the Newfoundland station in the Leocadia, which was paid off at the peace, and Plampin was placed on half-pay. In 1786 he went to France in order to study the language; and in 1787 to Holland to learn Dutch. During the armament of 1790 he was second lieutenant of the Brunswick with Sir Hyde Parker; at whose recommendation, based on his knowledge of the language and country, he was appointed in 1793 to a command in the squadron of gunboats equipping at Rotterdam for the defence of Willemstad, then besieged by the French When the siege was under Dumouriez. raised and the enemy retired from the country, the gunboats were dismantled, and Plampin, returning to England, joined the Princess Royal, on whose books he had been borne while with the Dutch gunboats. For this service he received from the StatesGeneral a gold medal and chain, transmitted the French privateer Henriette off Trincoto him by the ambassador at The Hague on 30 April 1793.

In the Princess Royal Plampin went out to the Mediterranean, and on the occupation of Toulon was appointed interpreter to the governor, Rear-admiral Samuel Granston Goodall [q. v.], and afterwards to Lord Hood, the commander-in-chief. On the evacuation of the port, Ilood promoted him to the rank of commander, dating his commission back to 30 Aug., the day of his landing at Toulon, and sending him home with despatches. In February 1794 Plampin was appointed to the Albion sloop for service in the Scheldt; and in the summer was moved to the Firm gun-vessel, in command of a flotilla of gun-boats in the Scholdt till driven out by the ice. On 21 April 1795 he was posted to the Ariadne frigate, then in the Mediterranean, where he joined her in June, and in the beginning of July was ordered to join the squadron under Nelson in the Gulf of Genoa. On the way he fell in with the French fleet, and, returning at once, brought the admiral the news of the enemy being at sea [sec HOTHAM, WILLIAM, LORD]. In September he was moved into the Lowestoft of 32 guns, which, on 7 Feb. 1796, off Toulon, was struck by lightning and dismasted. After a partial refit she was sent home with convoy and paid off. In November 1798 he again commissioned the Lowestoft and went to the West Indies in charge of a large convoy. In July 1801 he was ordered to convoy the trade to England, but, going through the Windward passage, was cast away on the Great Inagua, on the night of 10 Aug. The next morning he ordered the convoy to proceed in charge of the Acasta, leaving the Bonetta to assist in saving the crew of the Lowestoft and two of the merchant ships, lost at the same time. After three or four days' great exertion, every one was got safely on board the Bonetta, togother with a quantity of specie which was in the Lowestoft. The merchants acknowledged the service by paying the freight for the treasure as if it had been carried to England. A court-martial acquitted Plampin of all blame for the loss of the ship, and he returned to England in the Endymion.

On the renowal of the war in 1803 he was appointed to the Antelope of 50 guns, from which, in the autumn of 1805, he was moved into the 74-gun-ship Powerful, and sailed un- to retain for the customary term of three der the orders of Sir John Thomas Duckworth years notwithstanding his promotion, on [q. v.], too late to take part in the battle of 27 May 1825, to the rank of vice-admiral, Trafalgar. Duckworth detached the Power- He died at Florence on 14 Feb. 1884, aged ful as a reinforcement to the East Indian 72. His body was brought to England and squadron, and she had scarcely come on the buried at Wanstead in Essex. He was station before, on 18 June 1806, she captured married, but left no issue.

malee. Learning from her that a very fastmiling and successful cruiser, the Bellone, was also on the coast, Plampin disguised the Powerful like an East Indiaman, and, in company with the Rattlesnake sloop, succeeded in capturing her also on 9 July. 1 reflect with much pleasure, wrote Sir Edward Pellew, afterwards Viscount Exmouth [q. v.], the commander-in-chief, 'on the capture of La Bellone, as well from her superior sailing as her uncommon success in the present and preceding war against the British commerce. . . . The commercial interests of this country are particularly secured by her capture, which could not have been expected but under very favourable circumstances.' The vessel had, in fact, won such a reputation in the former war, that the merchants at Lloyd's had offered a reward of 10,000% for her capture, though, unfortunately for Plampin and the crow of the Powerful, the offer had lapsed at the peace of Amiens and had not been renewed.

In the autumn the Powerful was with Pellew on the coast of Java, and, after an independent cruise to the eastward, returned to Trincomalee very sickly; Plampin himself so ill that he was compelled to invalid. In 1809 he commanded the Courageux in the Walcheren expedition [see STRACHAN, STR RICHARD JOHN]; in 1810, the Gibraltar, as senior officer in Basque roads; and from 1812 to 1814, the Ocean off Toulon, under the orders of Sir Edward Pellew. On 4 June 1814 he was promoted to the rank of rearadmiral; and in November 1810 was appointed commander-in-chief on the Cape of Good Hope and St. Helena station, where he relieved Sir Pulteney Malcolm [q. v.] Some interesting notices of his conversations with Bonaparte are given by Ralfe (Naval Biography, iii. 384-5).

On his return to England in September 1820, Plampin made direct application—a method long since forbidden—for the K.O.B. in acknowledgment of his services at St. Helena; but was told, in reply, by Lord Molville that, creditable as his conduct had been, and satisfactory to the government, the K.C.B. could not be given except for survices against the enemy. In March 1825 he was appointed commander-in-chief on the Irish station, a post he was specially allowed Ralfe's Nav. Biogr. iii, 372; Marshall's Rov. Nav. Biogr. ii. (vol. 1. pt. ii.) 640; Gent. Mag 1834, i. 656; United Service Journal, 1834, pt. 1. p. 516, pt. ii. p. 386; Passing Certificate and Service-book in the Public Record Office ] J. K. L.

PLANCHÉ, JAMES ROBINSON (1796-1880), Somerset herald and dramatist, born in Old Burlington Street, Piccadilly, London, on 27 Feb. 1796, was son of Jacques Planché (1734-1816), a watchmaker, who was descended from a Huguenot refugee. Planché's mother (his father's cousin) was Catherine Emily (d. 1804), only child of Antoine Planché. From the age of eight James was educated by the Rev. Mr. Farrer in Lawrence Street, Chelsea; later on he studied geometry and perspective under Monsieur de Court, and in 1810 was articled to a bookseller. At an early age he developed a taste for the stage, and as an amateur acted at the Berwick Street, Pancras Street, Catherine Street, and Wilton Street private When twenty-two he wrote a theatres. burlesque 'Amoroso, King of Little Britain,' which was produced with success at Drury Lane on 21 April 1818. His second piece was a speaking harlequinade, 'Rodolph the Wolf, or Columbine Red Riding Hood, acted at the Olympic Pavilion on 21 Dec. 1818. Having adapted from a French melodrama, 'Le Vampire,' a play called 'The Vampire, or the Bride of the Isles,' he produced it at the English opera-house on 9 Aug. 1820, when the Vampire trap in the flooring of the stage, then first invented, proved a great attraction. During 1820-1 he wrote ten pieces for the Adelphi Theatre, including a very successful drama, 'Kenilworth Castle, or the Days of Queen Bess,' which was pro-duced on 8 Feb. 1821. His first opera, 'Maid Marian,' taken from Thomas Love Peacock's tale of that name, with music by Bishop, was seen at Covent Garden on 3 Dec. 1822

In 1828 on the revival of 'King John' at Durry Lane by Charles Kemble, Planché, after making historical researches, designed the dresses and superintended the production of the drama gratuitously. This was the first occasion of an historical drama being brought out with dresses of the period of its action. On 29 May 1825 he was present in Paris at the coronation of Charles X with the object of making drawings of dresses and decorations for a spectacle at Covent Garden which was produced there on 10 July. On 12 April 1820 he furnished the libretto to the opera of 'Oberon, or the Elf King's Oath,' specially written for Covent Garden Theatre by Carl von Weber; it was Weber's last composition.

During 1826-7 Planché was the manager of the musical arrangements at Vauxhall Gardens, and wrote the songs for the vaudeville 'Pay to my Order,' 9 July 1827. In 1828 he commenced to write regularly for Covent Garden, and on 11 Nov. brought out 'Charles XIIth, or the Siege of Stralsund,' a drama. An unauthorised production of this piece by William Henry Murray at the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, led to the appointment of a select parliamentary committee on dramatic literature (before which Planché gave evidence on 10 July 1832), and to the passing, on 10 June 1833, of the Act 3 William IV, c. 15, giving protection to dramatic authors.

During the season of 1830, for his friend Samuel James Arnold, he undertook the active management of the Adelphi Theatre. His version of Scribe and Auber's opera 'Gustave Trois, or the Masked Ball,'in which he vindicated the character of Madame Ankarström, who was still living, was produced with much success at Covent Garden on 13 Nov. 1833. In 1838 he undertook the libretto for an opera by Mendelssohn on the siege of Calais by Edward III. correspondence ensued with the composer (Planché, Recollections, i. 279-316), but ultimately the work was abandoned.

When Madame Vestris took the Olympic Theatre in 1831, Planché entered into professional relations with her, which lasted, with some intermissions, until she retired from theatrical management. He, in conjunction with Charles Dance [q. v.], wrote for her opening night, at the Olympic, 3 Jan. 1831, the burlesque 'Olympic Revels, or Prometheus and Pandora.' The performers were dressed in correct classical costume, and with the popular lessee in the chief rôle the piece was a great success. It was the first of a series of similar plays by Planché which occupied him at intervals for the next thirty years. At Christmas 1836, again in conjunction with Dance, he wrote for the Olym-pic Theatre, 'Riquet with the Tuft,' taken from the French féerie folie Riquet à la Houppe,' with Charles Mathews as Riquet and Madame Vestris as the Princess Esmeralda. On the marriage of Charles Mathews to Madame Vestris [see Mathews, Lucia Elizabeth], on 18 July 1838, and their visit to America, Planché was in charge of the Olympic Theatre until their return in December. When Madame Vestris removed to Covent Garden in 1839, Planché was appointed director of costume, reader of the plays sent in for approval, and superintendent of the painting-room. After various other engagements, Planché began writing for Benjamin Webster at the Haymarket, and produced 'The Fair One with the Golden Locks, 26 Dec. 1843, the first of several Christmas and Easter pieces, in which Priscilla Horton, afterwards Mrs. German need British Costumes, the result of a ten year. British Costumes, the result of a ten year. diligent study. The work rendered a great and when, in October 1847, she undertook the management of the Lyceum theatre, he became her superintendent of the decorative department and leading author. On the opening of her season, 18 Oct. 1847, he produced 'The Pride of the Market' from the French, and at Christmas 'The Golden His numerous burlesques and Christmas pieces, which were produced by Madame Vestris at the Lyceum, won him and his employer their chief theatrical reputation. His 'Island of Jewels,' acted on 26 Dec. 1849, was perhaps her greatest success there.

Other managers continued to welcome his work. On 28 March 1853 he brought out at the Haymarket 'Mr. Buckstone's Ascent of Mount Parnassus, a travesty of Albert Smith's entertainment The Ascent of Mont Blanc.' For Augustus Harris, at the Princess's Theatre, he prepared 'Love and Fortune, a comedy in verse after the manner of those acted at the fairs of Saint-Germain and Fontainebleau (24 Sept. 1859). This piece was not understood either by the public or the pross, and failed. On 12 July 1861 a comedy written by him fourteen years previously, My Lord and My Lady, was brought out at the Haymarket with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Mathews, Mrs. Wilkins, and J. B. Buckstone in the cast, and ran fifty nights. In September 1806 he adapted Offenbach's opera-bouffe, 'Orphee aux Enfers,' for the same theatre, under the title of Orpheus in the Haymarket; ' the piece ran from Christmas | 1823-5, 5 parts. 2. 'Shere Afkun, the first to Easter, and saw the first appearance of Louise Keeley. His last dramatic piece was 'King Christmas,' a one-act masque at the Gallery of Illustrations on 26 Dec. 1871, but he subsequently wrote the songs for 'Babil and Bijou,' a speciacle, at Covent Garden on 29 Aug. 1872.

Meanwhile Planché was making a reputation as an antiquary and a scholarly student of heraldry and costume. On 24 Dec. 1829 he was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. There he made the acquaintance of Hallam, Hudson Gurney, Crabb Robinson, and other literary men. He became dissatisfied with the management of the society in 1843, and aided in the formation of the British Archæological Association in December 1843; but when a secession took place in February 1845, he remained a member of the parent society, to the proceedings of which he made many valuable contr.butions. He resigned his membership in 1852. In 1831. with the advice and encouragement of Francis Douce and Sir Samuel Rush Meyrick [q.v.], he published 'The History of service to English historical painters. went to a second edition in 1847, and to a third in 1874. On 13 Feb. 1854 the Duke of Norfolk appointed him rouge croix pursuivant of arms at the Heralds' College, and in this capacity he went with Sir Charles G. Young, Garter king-of-arms, to Lisbon in May 1854, to invest the king of Portugal with the order of the Garter. In April 1805 he went on a second mission to Lisbon to invest Dom Louis with the Garter. After his promotion to the office of Somerset herald on 7 June 1866, he went on a third mission, this time to Vienna to present the Garter to the emperor of Austria. In 1857 he arranged Colonel Augustus Meyrick's collection of armour for the exhibition of art treasures at Manchester, and again in December 1868 at the South Kensington Museum. Between 1855 and 1869 Planché made several reports on the state of the armoury in the Tower of London; finally in the latter year he, at the request of the war office, rearranged the armour in chronological order and made a final report on the condition and maintenance. He was granted a civil list pension of 100% on 21 June 1871, and died at 10 St. Leonard's Terrace. Chelsea, on 30 May 1880.

Besides the works already mentioned, Planché's chief publications were: 1. 'Cotumes of Shakespeare's King John, &c., by J. K. Meadows and G. Scharf, with biographical, critical, and explanatory notices, husband of Nourmahal, a legend of Hindoostan,' 1823. 3. 'Descent of the Danube from Ratisbon to Vienna, 1828. 4. 'A Catalogue of the Collection of Ancient Arms and Armour, the property of Bernard Brocas, with a prefatory notice, 1884. 5. Regal Records, or a Chronicle of the Coronation of the Queens Regnant of England, 1838. 6. 'The Pursuivant of Arms, or Heraldry founded upon Facts, 1852; 3rd edit. 1874. 7. 'A Corner of Kent, or some account of the parish of Ashnext-Sandwich, 1864. 8. Pieces of Pleasantry for private performance during the Christmas Holidays, 1868. 9. Recollections and Reflections, 1872, 2 vols. 10. William with the Ring, a romance in rhyme, 1873. 11. 'The Conqueror and his Companions,' 1874, 2 vols., well written and often quoted as an authority. 12. 'A Cyclopædia of Costume, or Dictionary of Dress,' 1576-9 2 vols. 13. 'Suggestions for establishing an • English Art Theatre, 1879. 14. Extravaganzas, 1879, 5 vols. 15. 'Songs and Poems,' 1881. He also translated or edited: 'King Nut Cracker, a fairy tale from the German of A. H. Hoffmann, 1853; 'Fairy Tales by the Countess d'Aulnoy, translated 1855, 2nd edit. 1888; 'Four-and-twenty Fairy Tales selected from those of Perrault and other popular writers,' 1858; 'An Introduction to Heraldry by H. Clark, 18th edit, 1866. For the stage he wrote in all seventy-two original pieces, ten of them in conjunction with Charles Dance, and one with M. B. Honan, besides ninety-six translations and adaptations from the French, Spanish, Italian, and German, and alterations of old English authors.

On 26 April 1821 he married Elizabeth St. George (1796-1846). She wrote several dramas. 'The Welsh Girl,' a vaudeville acted at the Olympic Theatre, 16 Dec. 1833; 'The Sledge Driver,' a drama, Haymarket, 19 June 1834; 'A Handsome Husband,' a farce, Olympic, 15 Feb. 1836; 'The Ransom,' a drama, Haymarket, 9 June 1836; 'A Pleasant Neighbour,' a farce, Olympic, 20 Oct. 1836; and 'A Hasty Conclusion,' a burletta, Olympic, 19 April 1838 (Literary Gazette, 3 Oct. 1846, p. 859). She left two daughters: Katherine Frances, who married, on 19 Nov. 1851, William Curteis Whelan of Heronden Hall, Tenterden, Kent; and Matilda Anne [see Mackarness].

[Planché's Recollections and Reflections and Extravaganzas, with two portraits; The Critic, 1859, xix. 444, with portrait; Illustrated News of the World, 1861, vii. 273, with portrait; Illustrated Review, 1870, ii. 363-5; Cartoon Portraits, 1873, pp. 102-3, with portrait; Journal of British Archeological Association, 1880, xxxvi, 261-5; Smith's Retrospections, 1883, i. 43, 94, 257-76; Morning Advertiser, 31 May 1880, p. 5; Atheneum, 5 June 1880, pp. 727-8; Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News, 1880, xiii. 281, 283, with portrait; Illustrated London News, 1880, lxxvi. 577, with portrait; Theatre, 1880, ii, 95-9.]

G. C. B.

PLANCHÉ, MATILDA ANNE (1820-1881), author. [See Mackarness.]

PLANT, THOMAS LIVESLEY (1819–1883), meteorologist, the son of George Halewood Plant, iron merchant, by his wife Ann Livesley, was born at Low Moor, Bradford, Yorkshire, and educated at St. Outhbert's College, Ushaw, near Durham. From 1849 to 1881 he represented Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son, advertising contractors, in Birmingham. He died suddenly on 31 Aug. 1883. He married, on 21 June 1845, Jane Horne.

His attention had early been turned to the study of meteorology, and for the last forty-six years of his life he kept systematic records. He was author of 'Meteorology : its Study important for our Good,' 8vo. Birmingham, 1862. He read a paper before the British Association in 1862 On Meteorology, with a Description of Meteorological Instruments,' which contained an account of Osler's anemometer, and another paper in 1865 'On the Anomalies of our Climate;' but neither was printed in the 'Report.' Plant was a constant contributor to the local press on meteorological subjects, and furnished meteorological information to the 'Times' newspaper.

[Athenæum, September 1883, p. 310; information kindly supplied by his son, Mr. W. E. Plant; Brit. Mus. Cat.]

B. B. W.

PLANTA, JOSEPH (1744–1827), librarian, was born on 21 Feb. 1744, at Castegna in the Grisons, Switzerland. His father, the Rev. Andrew Planta, belonged to an old Swiss family, and was pastor of a reformed church at Castegna; he resided in England from 1752 as minister of the German reformed church in London, and from 1758 till his death in 1778 was an assistant-librarian at the British Museum. He was F.R.S. and a 'reader' to Queen Charlotte.

Joseph Planta was educated by his father, and afterwards studied at Utrecht and Göttingen. After visiting France and Italy he acted as secretary to the British minister at Brussels. In 1773 he returned to England, and was in that year appointed to succeed his father as an assistant-librarian at the British Museum. In 1776 he was promoted to the keepership of manuscripts. From 1799 till 1827 he was principal librarian of the museum. He granted additional facilities to the public, and during his administration there was a great increase in the number of visitors to the reading-room and the department of antiquities. He was a man of polished manners and catholic tastes. and did much to increase the collections and to stimulate the official publications. He wrote part of the published 'Catalogue of the Printed Books,' and much of the 'Catalogue of the MSS. in the Cottonian Library' (1802, fol.) From 1788 till 1811 he also held the post of paymaster of exchequer bills.

Planta died on 3 Dec 1827, aged 83. He married, in June 1778, Elizabeth Atwood, by whom he had one child, Joseph [q.v.] A Miss Planta, probably a sister, who was teacher to George III's children, died on 2 Feb. 1778 (Gent. Mag. 1778, p. 94). Planta was elected F.R.S. in 1774, and secretary to the Royal Society in 1770. A portrait of him in oils, presented by his son to the British Museum, hangs in the board-room. There is also an engraving (1817), by W. Sharp, of a portrait medallion of Planta by Pistrucci. Another by Engleheart, and engraved by II. Hudson in 1791, is mentioned by Bromley.

1284

Planta published: 1. 'An Account of the Romansch Language,' London, 1776, 4to (Phil. Trans. of Roy. Soc. 1xvi. 129). 2. 'The History of the Helvetic Confederacy,' 2 vols. London, 1800, 4to; 2nd edit. 1807, 8vo (chiefly based on the work of J. Von Müller). 'A View of the Restoration of the Helvetic Confederacy,' London, 1821, 8vo (a sequel to No. 2).

[Memoir by Archdescon Nares in Gent. Mag. 1827, pt. ii. pp. 564-5; Edwards's Lives of the Founders of the Brit. Mus. pp. 516 ff.; Statutes and Rules of the Brit. Mus. 1871; Nichols's Lit. Illustr. vii. 677; Brit. Mus. Cat.] W. W.

PLANTA, JOSEPH (1787-1847), diplomatist, was born on 2 July 1787"at the British Museum, of which institution his father, Joseph Planta [q. v.], was an official. He was educated by his father (Gent. Mag. 1827, pt. ii. p. 565), and at Eton, and in 1802, when only fifteen, was appointed by Lord Hawkesbury a clerk in the foreign office. In 1807 Canning promoted him to the post of précis writer, and omployed him as his private secretary till 1809. Planta was an intimate friend of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and made a tour of the English lakes with him in 1818. He was secretary to Lord Castlerough in the same year, during the mission to the allied sovereigns, which terminated by the treaty of Paris in 1814. He attended Castlereagh at the congress of Vienna in 1815, and brought to London the treaty of peace signed at Paris in November 1815. He was also with Castlereagh at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1818. From May 1827 till November 1830 he was one of the joint secretaries of the treasury, and in 1884 was made a privy councillor. He was elected M.P. for Hastings in 1827, 1830, 1837, and 1841. In 1844 he resigned his seat through ill-health, and his death took place in London on 5 April, 1817. By his will Planta left his entire property to his wife, and recommended the destruction of his papers. He lived in London for many years, at No. 10 Chandos Street, Cavendish Square (Walford, Old and New London, iv. 447), and about 1832 resided at Fairlight House, near Hastings in Sussex. Lord Stratford describes Planta as ' an amiable, kind-hearted friend, and an excellent man of business.'

[Gent. Mag. 1847, pt. ii. pp. 86, 87; Lane-Poole's Life of Stratford Canning.] W. W.

PLANTAGENET, FAMILY OF. Inveterate usage has attached the surname Plantagenet to the great house which occupied the English throne from 1154 to 1485, but the family did not assume the surname until the middle of the fifteenth century. It was originally-under the form Plante-genestea personal nickname of Geoffrey, count of Anjou, father of Henry II (cf. WAGE, Roman de Rou, ed. Andresen, ii. 437; Historia Comitum Andegavensium in Chroniques d'Anjou. pp. 229, 334), and it is traditionally derived from Geoffrey's habit of adorning his cap with a sprig of broom or planta genista. This explanation cannot be traced to any mediaval source (cf. Bouquer's Recueil, xii. 581 n.) According to Miss Norgate, 'the broom in early summer makes the open country of Anjou and Maine a blaze of living gold;' but tradition hardly justifies an association of the name with Geoffrey's love of hunting over heath and broom (MRS. GREEN, Henry II, p. 6). Another version ascribes it to his having applied some twigs of the plant to his person by way of penance' (Vestigia Anglicana, i. 266). There is, it should be noted, a village of Le Genest close to Laval in Maine (cf. Du Cange, s.vv. genesteium, geneta, and planta).

Geoffrey transmitted no surname, and Henry II, his son, the founder of the 'Plantagenet' dynasty, took from his mother the name Henry Fitz Empress, by which he was commonly known when his titles were not used. His descendants remained without a common family name for three centuries. long after surnames had become universal outside the blood royal. They were described by their christian name in conjunction either with a title or a personal epithet, as John 'Lackland,' or Edmund 'Crouchback;' or with a territorial appellation derived from their place of birth or some country or district with which they had connections, as John 'of Ghent,' Richard 'of Bordeaux," Edmund 'of Almaine,' Thomas 'of Lancaster.' If the younger branches had been longer-lived, these latter would no doubt have passed into surnames, as that 'of Lancaster' actually did for three generations (Complete Peerage, v. 5). In the early part of the lifteenth century the king's sons were often referred to simply as 'Monsieur John'

or 'Monsieur Thomas.'
Matters stood thus when Richard, duke of York, desiring to express the superiority of his descent in the blood royal over the Lancastrian line, adopted Plantagenet as a surname. It makes its first appearance in formal records in the rolls of parliament for 1460, when Richard laid claim to the throne, under the style of 'Richard Plantaginet, commonly called Duke of York.' He is described in the 'Concordia,' which recognised him as heirapparent, as 'the right high and myghty Prynce Richard Plantaginet, duke of York' (Rot. Parl. v. 375, 378). A passage in Gregory the chronicler (p. 189) implies that York assumed the name as early as 1418, when he did not venture to emphasise his dynastic claims more openly (RAMSAY, Lancaster and York, ii. 88). The pedigrees given by the Yorkist chroniclers, and evidently those which York laid before parliament, are all carried back to Geoffrey 'Plantagenet' and the counts of Anjou. None of them applies the name Plantagenet to any member of the family between Geoffrey and Richard (Harding, pp. 16, 258, 260; Wordsster, ed. Hearne, p. 527; Chron. ed. Davies, p. 101; Three Fifteenth-Century Chronicles, p. 170). The distinction is preserved by the Tudor historians and in the dramatis personæ of Shakespeare's historical plays. But Shakespeare in 'King John,' and one passage of the first part of 'Henry VI' (act iii. sc. 1, l. 172), uses the word as a family name of the whole dynasty (cf. RAMSAY). The last legitimate male bearer of the name was Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, grandson of York, executed in 1499. The last illegitimate bearer of the name is usually supposed to have been Arthur Plantagenet, viscount Lisle [q. v.], a natural son of Edward IV (Complete Peerage, v. 117; Fædera, xiv. 452). But an entry (not original) in the parish register of Eastwell, Kent, states that a 'Richard Plantagenet died here on 22 Dec. 1550,' and according to a circumstantial story related by Peck in his 'Desiderata Ouriosa' (1732), on the authority of Heneage Finch, earl of Nottingham, this Richard was an illegitimate son of Richard III, who was born in 1469, and, after the accession of Henry VII, worked as a bricklayer at Eastwell until about 1547. The story cannot be regarded as established (Gent. Mag. 1767, xxxvii. 408; Notes and Queries, 6th ser. viii. 103, 192, ix. 12; Walford, Tales of Great Families, 2nd ser. vol. i.; WILLIAM HESEL-TINE, Last of the Plantagenets).

The sovereigns of the Angevin dynasty appear in this dictionary under their christian names. Other members of the family are noticed under the following headings:—ARTHUR, Viscount Lisle (1480?-1542), see PLANTAGUNET, ARTHUR; EDMUND, surnamed Crouchback, Earl of Lancaster (1215-1296), see LANCASTER; FIDMUND, Earl of Cornwall (d. 1300), see under RIGHARD, Earl of Cornwall (1209-1272); EDMUND of Woodstock, Earl of Kent (1301-1330), see EDMUND: EDMUND de Langley, first duke of York (1841-1402), see LANGLEY; EDWARD, 'The Black Prince' (1830-1376), see EDWARD; EDWARD, second duke of York (1373?-1415). see 'Plantagenet,' Edward; Edward, Earl of Warwick (1475-1499), see Edward; GEOFFREY, Archbishop of York (d. 1212), see Geoffedy; George, Duke of Clarence (1449-1478), see Plantagener, George; Henry of Cornwall (1235-1271), see Henry; Henry. Earl of Lancaster (1281?-1345), see Henry; Henry, first Duke of Lancaster (1299?-1361), see Henry; Humphruy, Duke of Gloucester (1391-1447), see HUMPHREY; JOHN of Eltham, Earl of Cornwall (1316-1336), see John; John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster (1840-1899), see John; John of Lancaster, Duke of Bedford (1889-1485), see John; LIONEL of Antwerp, Duke of Clarence (1838-1868), see LIONEL; MARGARET, Countess of Salisbury (1478-1541), see Pole; RICHARD, Earl of Cornwall (1209-1272). see RICHARD; RICHARD, Earl of Cambridge (d. 1415), see RICHARD; RICHARD, Duke of York (1412-1460), see RICHARD; RICHARD, Duke of York (1472-1483), see RICHARD: THOMAS, Earl of Lancaster (1278-1322), see THOMAS; THOMAS of Brotherton, Earl of Norfolk (1300-1348), see THOMAS; THOMAS of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester (1856–1897), see Thomas; Thomas, Duke of Clarence (1388?-1421), see Thomas.

PLANTAGENET, ARTHUR, VISCOUNT Lisle (1480 ?-1542), born about 1480, was a natural son of Edward IV by one Elizabeth Lucie. As an esquire of Henry VIII's bodyguard he received a quarterly salary of 61. 13s. 4d. from June 1509 (cf. King's Book of Payments). He married, in 1511, Elizabeth, widow of Edmund Dudley [q. v.], and daughter of Edward Grey, viscount Lisle, and obtained a grant, on 18 Nov. of that year, of lands in Dorset, Sussex, and Lancashire, which had come to the crown by the attainder of Empson and Dudley in 1510. On 8 Feb. 1518 he obtained a protection (from his creditors) on going to sea with the expedition to Brittany. The ship in which he sailed struck upon a rock, and he and his companions were saved from death almost by miracle. 'When he was in the extreme danger [and all hope gone] from him, wrote Admiral Howard to the king on 17 April, 'he called upon Our Lady of Walsingham for help, and of fered unto her a vow that, an it pleased God and her to deliver him out of that peril, he would never eat flesh nor fish till he had seen her.' Accordingly, although Howard was reluctant to dispense with his services, Plantagenet was granted permission to return to England to fulfil his yow. In the summer Henry VIII himself crossed the seas, and Plantagenet went with him as one of the captains of the middle ward. He seems to have won his spurs in this campaign, for in November the same year 'Sir' Arthur Plantagenet was chosen sheriff of Hampshire, and in May following 'Sir' Arthur Plantagenet appears in the paymaster's books as captain, with 18d. a day, in the vice-admiral's ship, the Trinity Sovereigne. On 12 May 1519 he and his wife had livery of the lands of Edward Grey, viscount Lisle, his wife's brother John and his daughter, the Countess of Devon, having both died without issue. This grant was confirmed on 28 Feb. 1522. Plantagenet accompanied Henry VIII to the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and to the meeting with Charles V. In a household list of 1521 he is named as one of the carvers who shall serve the king in his privy chamber. On 25 April 1523 he obtained a grant of the title of Viscount Lisle, with remainder to his heirs male, by Elizabeth, his wife, on surrender of a patent conferring that title on Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk (see Report III of the Lords' Comnuittee on the Dignity of a Peer; also NICOLAS, Pecrage). On 23 April 1524 Lisle was elected a knight of the Garter (Anstis, Register, p. 366), and on 26 Nov. 1524 keeper of Olarendon Park. Next year, 16 July 1525, Henry VIII made his natural son, the Duke of Richmond, at the age of five, lord admiral of England, and the boy seems in turn to have nominated Lisle his vice-admiral. This office he held till the duke's death in On 22 Oct. 1527 he was appointed chief of an embassy sont into France to present the insignia of the order of the Gartor to Francis I. In the parliament of 1529 he was one of the triers of petitions.

His wife had died after 1523, and in 1528 he married again. His second wife was Honor Grenville, widow of Sir John Basset, who died 31 Jan. 1528 (Ing. post morten, 20 Hen. VIII, No. 73). Lisle and his wife accompanied Henry VIII to the meeting with Francis I at Calais in October 1532; Lady Lisle was one of the five ladies who, with Anne Boleyn, danced with the French king and his gentlemen. On the return voyage he was again in danger of shipwreck. On 24 March 1538 Lisle was nominated successor to John Bourchier, second baron Berners [q. v.], as deputy of Calais. Before going to Calais heacted as 'chief panter' at the banquet which celebrated the coronation of Queen Anne Boleyn. He took the oaths at Calais before the council there on 10 June 1583. and continued to reside there, harassed by debt, by disputes among the soldiers under him, and by religious controversies among the townsmen, until affairs became so unsettled that commissioners were sent to take over the government, and Lisle was summoned home (17 April 1540). Shortly after, 19 May, he was sent to the Tower on suspicion of being implicated in a plot headed by one Gregory Botolph, who had been his chaplain, to betray Calais to the pope and Cardinal Pole, and a new deputy was appointed on 2 July 1540. It was found that Calais had been very carelessly kept, but, the king is reported to have said, through ignorance rather than illwill. Lisle remained a close prisoner until 1542, when, in January, his collar of the Garter was restored to him, and early in March the king sent his chief secretary to give him a diamond ring, as a token, and to announce that, as he was proved innocent, the king restored him to liberty and favour. His excitement on hearing the news was so great that he died in the Tower the same night (cf. Foxu, Acts and Monuments, ed. Townsend, v. 515). He was buried in the Tower. His wife, immediately upon his apprehension, fell distraught of mind, and so continued many years after' (Foxe). Foxe (p. 505) describes her as 'an utter enemy to God's honour, and in idolatry, hypocrisy, and pride, incomparably evil. Both his wives, who were widows when he married them, had by their former husbandchildren, who called him father. His first wife had three daughters by him: Bridget, who married Sir William Carden; Frances, married, first, John Basset, and, secondly, Thomas Monke, ancestor of George Monck, duke of Albemarle [q. v.]; and Elizabeth who married Sir Francis Jobson.

Some valuable papers were seized in Lisle's house at the time of his arrest. They were mainly letters to him and his wife, ranging in date between 1533 and 1540, from ambassadors, princes, governors of French and Flomish frontier towns, with whom, in virtue of his position at Calais, he was brought into contact, as well as from friends and agents in England. There was also a correspondence between him and his wife during visits of one or the other to England. All the papers are now in the Public Record Office. Most of them were collected by one of the early record commissions, and bound into nineteen volumes, and some are printed in Wood's 'Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies.' They throw valuable and almost unique light upon the domestic life of the period, and occasionally upon great historical | king's step-brother, Thomas Holland, earl

Calendar of Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, Dugdale's Baronage; Herbert's History; Kaulek's Correspondance de M. de Marillac, R. H. B 1885.]

'PLANTAGENET,' EDWARD, more correctly EDWARD OF NORWIGH, second DUKE of York (1378?-1415), was the eldest child of Edmund de Langley, earl of Cambridge, and afterwards duke of York [see LANGLDY]. His father was the fifth son of Edward III, and his mother was Isabella of Castille, second daughter of Pedro the Oruel. Edward of Norwich was probably born in 1873 (at Norwich?), the year after his parents' marriage, though his age at his father's death, as given by Dugdale from the Escheat Rolls, would place his birth two or three years later (DOYLE; BELTZ, p. 310; DUGDALE, Baronage, ii. 155; Chron. du Religieux de St. Denys, ii. 356). He was knighted by Richard II at his coronation (Fædera, vii. 157). Betrothed to Beatrice, daughter of Ferdinand, king of Portugal, by the treaty of Estremoz (1380), as a condition of assistance against Henry of Castille, he was taken to Portugal by his father in July 1381, and the marriage was performed shortly after their arrival in Lisbon (ib. vii. 264; WALSINGHAM, i. 313). But Ferdinand making peace with Castille, Cambridge returned to England in 1382, taking with him his son, whom the king, it is said, wished to retain; Ferdinand refused to send his daughter with him, and shortly after remarried her to the infante John of Castille (ib. ii. 83)

Edward in May 1887 succeeded Sir Richard Burley as knight of the Garter. On 25 Feb. 1890 Richard II created him Earl of Rutland, with Oakham and the hereditary sheriffdom of the county for the support of the title. The grant, for which parliamentary confirmation was obtained, was, however, limited to his father's lifetime. Gloucester's reversionary rights in these old Bohun estates were ignored in the grant, but confirmed by the king a few months later, and again in 1391 (DUCIDALD, Baronage, ii. 156, 170; Rot. Parl. iii. 264; Associated Architectural Societies' Reports, xiv. 106, 112). A year later (22 March 1391) Rutland, despite his youth, was made admiral of the northern fleet, and in the following November sole admiral, an office which he retained until May 1398. In the spring of 1392 he was associated with his uncle, John of Gaunt, in the negotiations at Amiens for peace with France (BELIZ, p. 310; KNIGHTON, col. 2739). About the sume time he succeeded (27 Jan. 1392) the 'asserted that Richard had contemplated abdi-of Kent, as constable of the Tower of London. As Richard's relations with Gloucester and Arundel grew more and more strained, he showed increasing favour to Rutland, than whom, says Creton (p. 309), there was no man in the world whom he loved better. Accompanying the king on his first expedi-tion to Ireland in 1394, he was rewarded (before 9 March 1396) with the earldom of Cork, and acted as Richard's principal plenipotentiary in the conclusion of his marriage with Isabella of France (St. DENYS, ii. 333, 356, 359; Walsingham, ii. 215). A suggested marriage between Rutland himself and a sister of Isabella came to nothing, as Jeanne, the second daughter of Charles VI, was already betrothed to the heir of Brittany Wallon, ii. 415; Fædera, vii. 804). He figured prominently at the costly meeting between the two kings in October 1396 which preceded the marriage.

In the following spring he went abroad again on a mission to France and the princes of the Rhine. Offices were accumulated on him. In 1396 he was made warden of the Cinque ports, with the reversion of the governorship of the Channel Islands; in April 1397 warden and chief justice of the New Forest, and of all the forests south of Trent; and in June lord of the Isle of Wight, which had been in the hands of the crown for a century. It can hardly have been a mere coincidence that just before taking his revenge upon the lords appellant Richard entrusted so many strategical points along the Channel to the man who already commanded the fleet. When the crisis arrived, Rutland took a leading part in the arrest of Gloucester, Arundel, and Warwick; was given Gloucester's office of constable of England on 12 July, and headed the eight who appealed the prisoners of treason at Nottingham in August, and in the fatal September parliament (Annales Ricardi, p. 208; DUEDALE, ii. 156; Rot. Parl. iii. 374). In the next reign he was accused by the informer Halle of having sent his servants to assist in the murder of Gloucester (ib. iii, 452). Gloucester's lands in Holderness, and with them his title of duke of Aumarle or Albemarle, were granted (28-29 Sept.) to Rutland; and in December 1398 Oakham and the shrievalty of Rutland, in which Gloucester's reversionary rights had lapsed by his attainder, were regranted to Albemarle and his heirs His share of Arundel's possessions male. was Clun in the Welsh march and other estates. and of Warwick's the Hertfordshire manor of Flamsteed. In the next reign it was even cating in his favour (Annales Ricardi, p. 304). Richard constituted him in February 1398 warden of the west marches towards Scotland, and he officiated as constable at the abortive duel between Hereford and Norfolk at Coventry.

It is not impossible that, as he afterwards averred, Albemarle was somewhat alarmed at Richard's arbitrary treatment of Hereford, and Norfolk's prophecy that he would meet with a similar fate, even if it be not true that he and his father indignantly retired to Langley when Hereford was excluded from his inheritance (ib. iii. 382, 449; Traison et Mort, p. 160 n.) It is not absolutely necessary to suppose, however, that he had already been tampered with by Henry (cf. Archaelogia, xx. 21). The acts of treason during Richard's last fatal expedition to Ireland with which he is charged by its French chronicler, Creton, need not bear that construction except in the mind of a writer violently prejudiced by Albemarlo's subsoquent descriton of Richard's cause. delay in arriving with the last contingent of the fleet may easily have drawn reproaches from the hot-tempered king, without being due to other than unavoidable causes. Again he was giving the most obvious advice under the circumstances, in persuading Richard not to throw himself with a more handful of men into North Wales, immediately on hearing of Hereford's landing, but to return to Waterford, where he had left his fleet, and to take over his whole army (ib. xx. 309, 312). Creton is, moreover, inconsistent in admitting that Richard, after landing in South Wales, deserted his army, and in yet blaming Albemarle for subsequently dispersing it. In this version of the story Albemarle makes his way to Henry of Lancaster, through the heart of hostile Wales. But the English version that Richard left his steward, Sir Thomas Percy, to disband his army, and took Albemarle with him to Conway, seems more probable, though it contradicts the statement of aneye-witness (Annales Ricardi, pp. 248, 250).

Almost Henry's first act as king was to deprive Albemarle of the constableship, and the feeling in his first parliament against Albemarle as the supposed murderer of Gloucester was most intense; twenty gages were thrown down to him at once, and he had to thank the king for the mildness of his punishment. He was deprived of the dignity of duke and all the lands bestowed upon him in the last two years of the late reign (Rot. Parl. iii. 452). But in December he was again silting in the privy council, and on 20 Feb. following Henry actually renewed Richard's grant (1398) of Oakham and the shrievalty of Rutland to him and his heirs male, although the reversal of Gloucester's attainder had revived the rights of his heirs to the raversion (Assoc. Archit. Soc. Reports, xiv. 109). This latter fact in itself throws the gravest doubt on the story of his complicity in the conspiracy of Christmas 1399, at least in the form to which Shakespeare has given such wide currency. The dramatic episode of York's accidental discovery of his son's treason, and the hasty ride to Windsor, by which Albemarle anticipated his father in disclosing the plot to the king, was taken by the Tudor historians from the contemporary but untrustworthy and prejudiced Chronique de la Traison et Mort du Roy Richart (p. 283). There is no mention at all of Albemarle's complicity in any English authority written near the time, and that in some later fifteenth-century chronicles may be derived from the French source (Chronicle, ed. Davies, p. 20; FABYAN, p. 508; LILLAND, Collectanea, ii. 484). It is possible that he received the confidence of the conspirators in order to betray thom, which seems Creton's view; this and his presiding over the executions at Oxford would explain the bitter animus of the French authorities against him (RAMSAY, i. 21). Richard's brother-in-law, Waleran. comte de St. Pol, had Albemarle's effigy in his coat-armour hung feet uppermost from a gibbet near the gate of Calais (MONSTRELET, i. 68, ed. Douet d'Arcq). The strong terms in which the parliament of January 1401, in restoring him to the good name and estate impaired by the judgment of 1399, asserted his loyalty, coupling him with Somerset, in whose case there is no doubt, exclude the hypothesis of a serious complicity in the plot (Rot. Parl. iii. 460). Henry gave him a further proof of his restored confidence by appointing him on 28 Aug. 1401 to the important post of lieutenant of Aquitaine (Ord. Pring Council, i. 187). Some months later he was made governor of North Wales.

He was in Aquitaine when, on his father's death in August 1402, he became Duke of York. He soon returned, and on 29 Nov. 1403 received the onerous position of lieutenant of South Wales for three years (WXLIL, i. 244, 378). His Wolsh command was an ungrateful one. He was kept so ill-provided with funds that he could not pay the garrisons, although he disposed of his plate for the purpose. In order to quiet his mutinous soldiers he was forced to bega loan from the abbot of Glastonbury, and promised to pledge his Yorkshire estates, while the government still owed him large sums for his services in Aquitains (ib. i. 456). His discontent proved too strong for his loyalty, for there seems little doubt that he was engaged in the abortive attempt of his sister, Lady le Despenser, to carry off their young kinsmen, the Mortimers, from Windsor in February 1405 [see MORTIMDE, EDMUND DE, 1391-1425). Lady le Despenser was not a woman of the highest character, and the plot for Henry's assassination at the previous Christmas, of which she accused York, may be open to doubt, but he confessed some of the charges brought against him (Annales Henrici IV, p. 398; Fædera, viii. 386). He was arrested and sent to Pevensey Castle for safe keeping, while his estates were seized into the hands of the crown. After he had been seventeen weeks in prison he vainly petitioned for release on account of his 'disease and heaviness;' it was presently rumoured that he was dead, but on 7 Oct. the king ordered him to be brought to him (at Kenilworth?), and on 26 Nov. he was present at Lambeth at the marriage of the Earl of Arundel (ib. viii. 887; Wille, ii. 48). His sequestrated estates were restored to him, and on 22 Dec. he was again made a privy councillor. In November 1406 York once more became constable of the Tower, and subscribed the agreement under which Aberystwith Castle was surrendered just a year later, shortly after the Prince of Wales had earnestly vindicated the duke's loyalty in parliament (Rot. Parl. iii. 611; Fædera, viii. 497). In 1409 he received orders to remain on his estates in the Welsh marches and repress the rebels (ib. viii. 588). Three years later Henry granted him Oakham for life, and he served under the Duke of Clarence in his expedition to France; he remained in Aquitaine after the death of Henry IV, pushing his claims as a son of Isabella of Castille to the disputed throne of Arragon (RAMSAY, i.167). On his return Henry V, in the second year of his reign, appointed him justice of South Wales and warden of the east marches towards Scotland, and had the parliamentary declaration in his favour of 1401 renewed (Rot. Parl. iv. 17); but it was finally decided that his rights in the Rutland estates had lapsed at his father's death. In 1415 he accompanied Henry to France, and commanded the right wing at Agincourt, where he was one of the few of the victors who perished, 'smouldered to death,' if we may accept Leland's authority (Itinerary, i. 4-5), by much heat and thronging (Gesta Henrici P, pp. 47, 50, 58; Ln Fryre, pp. 59-60). His body was taken back to England, and interred in the choir of Fotheringhay church, under a flat marble slab, with his image in brass. On Henry's return there was a public funeral in London on 1 Dec. to York and the rest of the fallen. At the dissolution of the monasteries the Duke of Northumberland pulled down the choir and exposed the body of York; Elizabeth ordered its reinterment and the erection of the present monument.

In his will, made during the siege of Harfleur in August 1415, York describes himself as 'de tous pecheurs le plus mechant et coupable,' directs that in all masses and prayers to be made for him there should be included Richard II and Henry IV, and devises a legacy of 20% to Thomas Pleistede, in memory of the kindness he had shown him when confined at Pevensey (Nichols, Royal Will., p. 217; Duedale, ii. 157).

York married Philippa, second daughter and coheiress of John, lord Mohun of Dunster, Somerset, who had already been twice married, first to Walter, lord Fitzwalter (d. 1386), and, secondly, to Sir John Golafre of Langley, Oxon. (d. 1396). Her claims on the Dunster estates had drawn York into litigation under Henry IV (Archæologica) Journal, xxxvii. 164). She survived her third husband, by whom she had no issue; but her remarriage with Sir Walter (or Robert) Fitzwalter, which has passed from Dugdale into so many accounts, is a confusion with her first marriage. She died in 1431, and was buried in Westminster Abbey (Complete Peerage, iii. 370, v. 322; WYLIE, ii. 48). York was succeeded in the title and his great estates by his nephew, Richard, duke of York (1412-1460) [q. v.], son of his younger brother Richard, earl of Cambridge. Though Henry IV was the nominal founder of the College of the Blessed Virgin Mary and All Saints in Fotheringhay church, York provided the endowment, and is designated co-founder in the charter granted by Henry on 18 Dec. 1411 (DUGDALE, Monasticon, vi. 1411). It was founded for a master, twelve chaplains, eigh' clerks, and thirteen choristers. In consideration of the heavy expense it had entailed upon York, Henry V, before starting for France. empowered him to enfeoff Henry Beaufort, bishop of Winchester, and others, with a large part of his estates as security for a loan (ib. p. 1413). But the reconstruction of the church does not seem to have been begun until 1434.

[Rotuli Parliamentorum; Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council (ed. Nicolas); Rymer's Federa, original edit.; Annales Ricardi II et Henrici IV (with Trokelowe), Walsingham's Historia Anglicana, and the Eulogium Historiarum (all in Rolls Ser.); Adam of Usk, ed. Maunde Thompson; Chron, of the Monk of Evesham, ed. Hearne; Chronique de la Traïson et Mort du Roy Richart II, ed. Williams, for English Historical Soc.; Creton's Chron. in verse, ed. Rev. J. Webb, in Archaeologia, vol. xx.; Gesta Henrici V (English Historical Soc.); English Chron. 1377–1461, ed. Davies (Camden Soc.); Fabyan's Ohron. ed. Ellia; Chronique du Religieux de St. Denys, ed. Bellaguet; Le Fèvro de St. Remy and Monstrelet (Soc. de l'Histoire de France); Reports and Papers of the Associated Architectural and Archæological Societies of Sheffield, Leicestershire, &c.; Wallon's Richard II; Wylie's Henry IV; Ramsay's Lancaste and York; Dugdale's Monasticon Anglicanum (ed. 1817) and Barouage; G. E. Cjokayne's Completo Pecrage; Beltz's Memorials of the Order of the Garter.]

PLANTAGENET, GEORGE, DUKE OF CLARINCE (1449-1478), was the sixth son, the third surviving infancy, of Richard, duke of York (1412-1460) [q.v.], by Cecily Neville, daughter of Ralph, first earl of Westmorland [q.v.] He was born at Dublin during his lather's residence in Ireland as lord lieutenant on 21 Oct. 1449 and baptised in the church of St. Saviour's (WORDESTER, p. 527; Complete Peerage, ii. 271; cf. Chron. of White Rose, p. 6). After his father's death, in December 1460, he and his younger brother Richard were sent for safety to Utrecht, whence he was brought back on his brother Edward's accession, in March 1461, and created (in June P) Duke of Clarence, a title emphasising the hereditary claims of the House of York, with a grant of many forfeited Percy manors and (September 1462) the honour of Richmond for its support. About the same time he was made knight of the Bath and of the Garter, and in February 1462 lord licutenant

The commissioners appointed in March 1466 to conclude a marriage between his sister Margaret and Charles, count of Charolais, heir to the duchy of Burgundy, were also empowered to arrange a match for Clarence with the count's only child Mary (Fædera, xi. 565). But the chief commissioner, Warwick 'the Kingmaker,' finding Edward IV bent on throwing off his control, had other plans for the disposal of the younger brother's hand. Clarence, still heir-presumptive and involved in a quarrel of his own with the queen's kinsmen, readily lent himself to Warwick's intrigues, which included the duke's marriage to the elder of Warwick's two daughters who would inherit his vast domains. But this could only be managed by a papal dispensation, for Clarence's mother was both great-aunt and godmother to Isa-bella Neville, and Edward put every possible obstacle in the way of its being granted. Warwick, however, succeeded in throwing dust in the king's eyes, secretly obtained the dispensation from Paul II (14 March 1468 according to Drabate, ii. 163), and in July 1469 suddenly summoned Clarence to Calais, where the ceremony was performed on the 11th by Warwick's brother, Archbishop Neville, in the church of Notre Dame. Clarence at once joined his father-in-law and the archbishop in issuing a manifesto to the English announcing their speedy coming, and calling upon all true subjects to assist them in an armed demonstration, nominally to call the king's attention to necessary reforms [see NIVILLE, RICHARD, EARL OF WARWICK].

The battle of Edgecot made Edward their prisoner, and, though public opinion compolled them to release him, they were strong enough to extract an amnesty from him, under cover of which they seem to have continued their intrigues. They proceeded with such secrecy that, in spite of the 'to doo' made by bills set up by them in London in February 1470, Edward did not apparently in the least suspect that they had any hand in stirring up the Lancastrian rebellion in Lincolnshire (cf., however, OMAN, p. 198). He put off his departure to suppress it for several days in order that he might meet Charence, who, with extreme duplicity, accompanied him to St. Paul's to offer prayers for his success. Clarence remained behind, but a most dutiful letter from him reached the king at Roysfon in Cambridgeshire on 8 March, offering to bring Warwick to his assistance. Edward was so thoroughly deceived that he authorised the two plotters to raise troops on his bohalf, little knowing that, before joining his father-in-law at Warwick, Clarence had had a socret interview with Lord Welles, one of the conspirators (RAMSAY, ii. 349). Edward's suspicious were roused by the presence among the rebels at the battle of Empingham of men wearing Clarence's livery, and the raising of the war cries of 'a Clarence!' 'a Warwick!' He at once sent off an order commanding them to disband their forces and join him with an ordinary escort. Finding the game up, and perhaps foresoeing Sir Robert Welles's confession that Warwick was planning to make Clarence king, they turned north-westward. Followed by the king, who on 28 March deprived Clarence of the lord-lieutenancy of Ircland, they reached Manchester, whence they doubled south, and made their way along the Welsh border. Finally they took ship at Dartmouth for Calais. But Warwick's lieutenant there refused them admittance, and after riding at anchor for some days, during which the Duchess of Clarence, who was on board, gave birth to a son, they sailed to Harfleur, and were afterwards effusively received by the French king.

In September 1470 Clarence returned to England with Warwick, and Edward IV

fied the country. The Lancastrian restora- In February 1472 Clarence was reported to tion, thereupon carried out with cynical indifference to consistency by Warwick, could not be expected to enlist the enthusiastic support of Clarence. The remote prospect of his succession to the throne if the issue of Henry VI should fail, and even the more tangible sop by which the whole inheritance of his father was settled on him, was poor compensation for the uncomfortable dis-covery that he had been a merc pawn in the hands of Warwick's ambition. The proposal for him to share with Warwick the joint lieutenancy of the realm in behalf of Henry VI did not soothe his wounded vanity, though he dared not give open expression to his resentment (POLYDORD VERGIL, p. 134; cf. Arrivall, p. 41). In the course of the cf. Arrivall, p. 41). In the course of the winter (1470-1), if not before, during his stay in France, his mother and sisters secretly reconciled him with his exiled brother, and obtained his promise to join Edward as soon as he should land (ib.) When that happened in the spring of 1471, Clarence took care to wait until Edward was blockading Warwick in Coventry and he could bring over a force that would give weight to his accession. After, it is said, preventing Warwick from fighting by urging him to wait his arrival, he ordered the four thousand men he had levied for Henry VI to mount the white rose of York and marched them to Edward's camp at Warwick, where the two brothers had rence accompanied his brothers in the French 'right kind and loving language' between their armies, and swore 'perfect accord for ever hereafter' (i.; WARKWORTH, p. 15). They fought together at Barnet and at Tewkesbury, where Polydore Vergil (p. 152) represents Clarence as joining Gloucester and Hastings in murdering his brother-in-law, the unfortunate Prince Edward, in cold blood after the battle. The only support the story finds, however, in the strictly contemporary writers is Warkworth's statement that he 1476, and the death of Charlesthe Bold a fort-'cried for succour' to Clarence.

The crime, if crime it was, brought its own punishment in the resolute determination of Gloucester to marry the widowed Anne Neville and share hor mother's inheritance with Clarence. The two brothers quarrelled bitterly, and their strife threatened the peace of the kingdom for several years. Clarence did not hesitate to carry off his young sister-inlaw, over whom he perhaps claimed rights of wardship, and place her in hiding dis-guised as a kitchenmaid; but Gloucester discovered her in London, and put her in sanctuary at St. Martin's. The two dukes argued their case in person before the king in council with a skill and pertinacity which astonished even lawyers (Croyl. Cont. p. 557).

be now willing to let his brother have the lady, but resolved to 'parte no lyvelod' (Paston Letters, iii. 38). Not even his creation, jure uxoris, as Earl of Warwick and Salisbury (25 March 1472), nor the post of great chamberlain (20 May), sufficed to remove his opposition to the partition. The act of 1473 resuming crown grants, while protecting Gloucester, gave Clarence further cause of discontent by pointedly omitting to make an exception in his favour, and thus depriving him of Tutbury and other castles. Towards the end of the year Clarence was reported to be 'making himself big in that he can,' and the situation was so strained that most of those at court sent for their armour (ib. iii. 98). But Edward seems to have been at last roused to decisive interference, and in the parliamentary session of 1474 a partition of the estates, which the late Earl of Warwick had acquired by his marriage with Anne Beauchamp, between her two daughters and their husbands was ordered; her own rights were thrust aside (Rot. Parl. vi. 100). The bulk of Warwick's Neville estates went to Gloucester, but Clarence received Clavering in Essex and some London property (ib. pp. 124-5). Edward also bestowed upon him the forfeited lands of the Courtenays in the south-west.

Harmony was for a time restored, and Claexpedition of 1475; but it did not last long. Clarence doubtless discovered that his past offences, though forgiven, could not be entirely forgotten, and that he was less trusted by the king than Gloucester or the queen's kinsmen. He sulked and held aloof from court. Mischief-makers carried what each of them said to the other (Croyl. Cont. p. 561). Circumstances soon gave a dangerous turn to his discontent. His wife died on 21 Dec. night later made Mary of Burgundy, whose hand had once been sought for Clarence, mistress of all Charles's dominions. Clarence at once offered himself as a suitor, and enjoyed the support of her stepmother, Margaret, whose favourite brother he was. But, on political as well as personal grounds, Edward placed his veto on the match, as it would have involved him in difficulties with France, and the queen and her family are said to have pushed the claims of Earl Rivers.

Olarence revenged himself in most highhanded fashion. He had one of his late wife's attendants, Ankarette, widow of Roger Twynyho of Cayford, Somerset, through whom he no doubt wished to strike at the queen, arrested, without the formality of a warrant, on a charge of having caused her mistrees's death by 'a venymous drynke of ale myst with poyson.' She was hurried off to Warwick, her native county, and summarily tried, condemned, and executed by the justices in petty sessions, apparently in the presence of Clarence. A writ of certiorari was issued too late to save the unfortunate victim of this judicial murder. Nor was she the only one. John Thuresby suffered on a charge of poisoning Clarence's infant son Richard (d. 1 Jan. 1477), though Sir Roger Tocotes obtained an acquittal (Rot. Parl. vi. 178-4; Deputy-Keeper Publ. Records, 3rd Rep. ii. 214). The court party turned Clarence's weapon against himself by extracting from John Stacy, a reputed wizard, under torture, a denunciation of Thomas Burdet of Arrow in Warwickshire, one of Clarence's confidents. A special commission met (19 May) at Westminster, before which Burdet was vaguely charged with having compassed the death of the king in April 1474; with instigating Stacy and another necromancer to calculate the nativities of the king and Prince of Wales; with predicting the king's speedy death on the eve of his departure for France in 1475; and with circulating just before the trial seditious and treasonable rhymes against the king. Sir James Ramsay suggests that this last may have been the well-known prophecy that the king should be succeeded by one the first letter of whose name should be G. Despite their plea of not guilty, Burdet and Stacy were condemned, and hanged at Tyburn on 20 May. Next day Clarence brought the Franciscan Dr. William Goddard before the privy council to testify to their dying protestations of innocence—an unfortunate choice, for Goddard had preached the restoration sermon of Henry VI in 1470. Clarence's enemies no doubt took care to connect this with the evidence which had been laid before Edward to prove that his brother was once again conspiring to make himself king. Summoning Clarence to meet him in the presence of the mayor and aldermon, he committed him to the Tower. We may suppose that Edward's distrust had been heightened by the recent Scottish proposal for a double marriage—one between the ambitious Albany, brother of James III, and the other between Clarence and their sister Margaret. Contemporary chroniclers, both in this country and abroad, traced Clarence's death to his intrigues with Burgundy (RAM-SAY, ii. 422).

But they were graver offences of which Edward personally accused his brother in the parliament of January 1478. Ungrateful for the oblivion extended to his former treason, he had slandered him to his subjects as having had Burdet unjustly put to death, and as working by necromancy to poison any who stood in his way; had spread rumours that he was a bastard, and no rightful king; had secretly received oaths of allegiance from a number of the king's subjects to himself and his heirs, exhibiting an exemplification, under the seal of Henry VI, o: the act of 1470, securing to him the reversion of the crown on the failure of Henry's issue; and, lastly, had made actual preparations for a new rebellion, and for secretly sending his son to Ireland or Flanders, substituting another child to personate him at Warwick Castle. Edward concluded by declaring his brother incorrigible, and that he could not answer for the peace of the realm if such 'loathly offences' were pardoned. The scene is described by the Croyland chronicler (p. 562) as a most painful one, no one but Clarence himself venturing to reply to the king, and the few witnesses behaving more like prosecutors than witnesses. What proofs were adduced does not appear. The disturbed state of certain districts in the early months of this year seems to have lent the charges some colour and the repeal in the same session of the succession act in Clarence's favour (1470) was doubtless due te a suspicion that he was ready to take advan tage of its terms (RAMSAY, ii. 424; Rot. Parl. vi. 191). The imprisonment, shortly before 6 March 1478, of Bishop Robert Stillington [q.v.] of Bath, who, under Richard, claimed to have married Edward to an English lady previous to his alliance with Elizabeth Wydeville, possibly suggests that Clarence had already spread this story abroad (Excerpta Historica, p. 354; COMMINES, ii. 157). Disregarding the duke's vigorous denials, which he offered to support by personal combat, both houses passed the bill of attainder, and a court of chivalry, presided over by the Duke of Buckingham, passed sentence of death (8 Feb.; Rot. Parl. vi. 195). Edward's own reluctance, or the remonstrances of some of those about him, delayed its execution for more than a week. Sir Thomas More reports that Gloucester opposed his brother's death, though, 'as men deemed, somewhat more faintly than he that were heartily minded to his wealth.' This surmise, described by More himself as devoid of certainty, is the only positive foundation for Shakespeare's ascription of Clarence's death to Gloucester. Richard, it is true, benefited considerably by his brother's fall, and the religious foundations he made immediately after have been interpreted as possible marks of remorse (GAIRD-KER, Richard III, p. 45). But Mr. Cokayne assumes too much when he says that Clarence was condemned chiefly through the influence of Gloucester (Complete Peerage, ii. 272).

A petition by the commons for justice on the duke gave the king the appearance at least of yielding to outside pressure in ordering the carrying out of the sentence. He waived a public execution, either from personal scruples and motives of prudence, or at the instance of their mother, the widowed Duchess of York (Commines, ii. 147, ed. Lenglet). It was therefore carried out secretly within the Tower on 17 or 18 Feb. 1478. The well-informed Croyland chronicler, a member of Edward's council, does not mention the manner of his death, implying that various rumours were abroad. But three contemporaries, writing somewhat later—two of them English and one French—agree that he was drowned in a butt of malmsey wine, the much-prized vintage of Malvasia .n the east of the Morea ('London Chronicle,' in MS. Cott. Vitellius, A. xvi. fol. 136; FABYAN, p. 666; COMMINES, i. 69, ii. 147, ed. Dupont; cf. Busch, England under the Tudors, Engl. transl. i. 406). It may have been only a London rumour. Lingard (iv. 211) dismisses it rather too contemptuously as a 'silly report.' Mr. Gairdner suggests that the choice of this mode of death may have been accidental. Shakespeare represents the murderer as finding the butt of malmsey conveniently at hand to complete his work (Richard III, p. 40). Clarence was buried in Tewkesbury Abbey with his wife,

The king, though now rid of the last of the 'idols to whom the people had been accustomed to look for revolution,' did not escape the pangs of remorse for this fratricidal execution; when besought to use his prerogative on behalf of malefactors, he would exclaim bitterly, 'O unfortunate brother, for whose life not one creature would make intercession!' (Croyl. Cont. p. 562; GRAFTON, Yet we have no sufficient grounds for holding Clarence guiltless of the ingratitude and treason alleged against him. His previous record of weakness and treachery discourages the more charitable view. In person he shared some of the physical advantages of Edward, but he lacked the conspicuous ability of his two brothers.

By Isabella Neville, Clarence had four children, of whom two only survived infancy: Margaret Plantagenet (afterwards Countess of Salisbury, and wife of Sir Richard Pole, born 14 Aug. 1478) [see Pole, Margaret]; and Edward Plantagenet [see Edward, Earl of Warwick], born 25 Feb. 1475. The son, unnamed, born at sea in the spring of 1470, and Richard Plantagenet, born in December 1476, both died quite young.

[Rotuli Parliamentorum; Rymer's Fœdera, orig edit.; Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council, ed. Nicolas; William Worcester, at end of Stevenson's Wars in France, in Rolls Ser. and ed. Hearne; Warkworth's Chronicle, Arrivall of Edward IV, and Polydore Vergil (Camden Soc.); Chronicles of the White Rose, 1845; Bentley's Excepta Historica, 1831; Grafton (embodying More) with Hardyng, and Fabyan, ed. Ellis, 1811-12; Croyland Continuator, ed. Fulman, 1684; Commines, ed. Lenglet du Fresnoy, 1747, and Mülle. Dupont, 1840, Dugdale's Baronage; Complete Peerage, by G. E C[okayne]; Ramsay's Lancaster and York.]

PLAT or PLATT, SIR HUGH (1552-1608), writer on agriculture and inventor, baptised at St. James's, Garlickhythe, on 3 May 1552, was third son of Richard Plat or Platt, a London brewer, who, owning property in St. Pancras, London, bequeathed much of it to the foundation and endowment of a free school and six almshouses at Aldenham, Hertfordshire, and was buried at St. James's, Garlickhythe, on 28 Nov. 1600 (OLUTTERBUCK, Hertfordshire, i. 86; Stow, London, ed. Strype, bk. iii. p. 11). Hugh's mother, Alice, was daughter of John Birtles, of Birtles, Cheshire. Plat matriculated as a pensioner of St. John's College, Cambridge, on 12 Nov. 1568, and graduated B.A. in 1571-2. Soon afterwards he became a member of Lincoln's Inn. Amply provided for by his father, he devoted his early years to literary studies. In 1572 he made his first ap~ pearance in print as the author of 'The Floures of Philosophie, with Pleasures of Poetrie annexed to them, as wel plesant to be read as profitable to be followed of al men, London, 12mo, 1572; dedicated to Anne Dudley, countess of Warwick. 'The Floures of Philosophie 'comprises 883 short sentences from Seneca; 'The Pleasures of Poetry' is a collection of miscellaneous poems of a pedestrian order. The only known copy is imperfect Censura Literaria, iii. 1-7). This work was followed by a similar undertaking, entitled Hygonis Platti armig. Manuale sententias aliquot Dininas et Morales complectens partina è Sacris Patribus, partim è Petrarcha philosopho et Poeta celeberrimo decerptas,' London, 16mo, 1584; new edit. 1594 (Brit. Mus.)

But Plat soon developed active interest in natural science, mechanical inventions, domestic economy, and especially in agriculture. To the last subject he devoted most of his later life. He corresponded with all lovers of gardening and agriculture in the country, and his investigations into the effects of various manures, especially salt and marl, proved of genuine value. He resided in 1594 and later years at Bishop's Hall, Bethnal Green, subsequently removing to the neighbouring Kirby Castle. Both at Bethnal Green and in St. Martin's Lane he maintained gardens, where he conducted horticultural and agricultural experiments, and, in pursuit of his researches, he often visited Sir Thomas Heneage's estate at Copt Hall, Essex, and other great landowners' properties.

In 1592 Plat exhibited to some privy councillors and the chief citizens of London a series of mechanical inventions, and next year printed, as a broad-sheet, some account of them in 'A brief Apologie of certen new Inventions completed by H. Plat' (licensed to Richard Field in 1592). A unique copy belongs to the Society of Antiquaries. But he gave no adequate description of his varied endeavours till 1594, when there appeared 'The Jewell House of Art and Nature, conteining divers rare and profitable Inventions. together with sundry new Experiments in the Art of Husbandry, Distillation and Moulding. By Hugh Platte of Lincolnes Inn, Gent.,' London, 4to, 1594; dedicated to Robert, earl of Essex. The volume consists of five tracts with separate title-pages, viz.: (1) 'Divers new Experiments;'(2)' Diverse new Sorts of Soyle not yet brought into any Publique Use;' (3) 'Chimical Conclusions concerning the Art of Distillation; '(4) 'Of Moulding, Casting Metals;' (5) 'An offer of certain New Inventions which the Author proposes to Disclose upon reasonable Considerations.' The second of these tracts, which was also issued separately, contains important notes by Plat on manures, and the last tract deals with miscullaneous topics, like the brewing of beers without hops, the preservation of food in hot weather and at sea, mnemonics, and fishing. Another edition of the whole appeared in 1613, and a revised edition, dedicated to Bulstrode Whitelocke, was prepared in 1653 by 'D. B.' (i.e. Arnold de Boate [q. v.]), who added 'A. Discourse on Minerals, Stones, Gums, and Rosins.' In 1595 Plat gave further hints of the results of his practical study of science in 'A Discoverie of certain English Wantes which are royally supplied in this Treatise. By H. Plat, of Lincolnes Inne, Esquire,' London, 4to, 1595 (Brit. Mus.; reprinted in 'Harleian Miscellany,' vol. ix.) In the same year he issued 'Sundrie New and Artificiall Remedies against Famine. Written by H. P., Esq., upon thoccasion of this present Dearth,' London, 4to; new edit. 1596; and his 'Newfounde Art of Setting of Corne' appeared about the same time without date. Other editions followed in 1600 and 1601.

Not the least popular of Plat's books was his curious collection of recipes for preserving fruits, distilling, cooking, housewifery, cosmetics, and the dyeing of hair. Much of the information Plat had already divulged in his 'Jewell-house.' The title of the completer venture ran: Delights for Ladies to adorne their Persons, Tables, Closets, and Distillatories; with Bewties, Banquets, Perfumes, and Waters, London (by Peter Ladies 1800). Short), 12mo, 1602; other editions, 1609, 1611, 1617, 1632, 1636, 1640, and 1656. Prefixed are some verses by Plat addressed 'to all true louers of art and knowledge.' in which he describes the various topics on which he had written. The first part of the volume reappeared posthumously as 'A Closet for Ladies and Gentlemen, on the art of Preserving, Conserving, and Candying. With the manner how to make diverse kinds of Syrupes: and all kinde of Banquetting Stuffes,' London, 12mo, 1611. 1603 Plat gave an account of an invention of cheap fuel-i.e. coal mixed with clay and other substances, and kneaded into balls—in a tract called 'Of Coal-Balls for Fewell wherein Seacoal is, by the mixture of other combustible Bodies, both sweetened and multiplied,' London, 4to, 1603. Richard Gosling reissued in 1628 an account of Plat's device, and developed it further in his 'Artificial Fire,' 1644.

In consideration of his services as inventor, Plat was knighted by James I at Greenwich on 22 May 1605. His chief His chief vork on gardening appeared in 1608, as 'Floraes Paradisc beautified and adorned with aundry sortes of delicate Fruits and Flowers . . . with an offer of an English Antidote . . . a Remedy in violent Feavers and intermittent Agues. The preface is dated from 'Bednal Green, 2 July 1608.' An appendix of 'new, rare, and profitable inventions' describes among other things, Plat's fireballs and his experiments in making wine from grapes grown at Bethnal Green. This wine, Plat says, had excited the commendation of the French ambassador 'two years since,' and of Sir Francis Vere, and Plat promised to expound his view on English wine-culture in a volume to be called 'Secreta Dei Pampinei.' Plat is careful in his description of gardening experiments, all of which were, he says, wrung out of the earth by the painful hand of experience,' to state the name of his informant in all cases where he had not done the work himself. He quotes repeatedly Mr. Andrew Hill, Mr. Pointer of Twickenham, 'Colborne,' and Parson Simson. 'Floraes Paradise' was reissued with some omissions and rearrangements by Charles Bellingham, who claimed relationship with Plat, in 1653, with a dedication to Francis Finch. It then bore the title 'The Garden of Eden; or an accurate Description of all Flowers and Fruits now growing in England...By that learned and great observer, Sir Hugh Plat, Knight, London, 12mo, 1653, called the fourth edition; another edition, 1659; 5th ed. 1660. Bellingham issued a second part drawn from Plat's unpublished notes in 1660, and both were issued together in 1675, in a so-called sixth edition. Another edition followed in the year 1685.

Many unpublished notes and tracts by Plat on scientific topics are among the Additional MSS. at the British Museum. Among these are 'Collections relating to Alchymy' (Addit. MSS. 2194, 2195, 2228, 2246); 'Secrets of Physick and Surgery' (Addit. MS. 219; cf. 2203, 2209, 2210, and 3690); 'Secrets of Metalls, Minerals, Animals, Vegetables, Stones, Pearls, &c., with a Monopolie of profitable Observations' (Addit. MS. 2245). Evelyn sent to Lr. Wotton in 1696 'A Short Treatise concerning Metals' by Plat (Diary, iv. 18). Plat died late in 1608, when his will was proved. His affairs were somewhat involved, although he left property at St. James's Garlickhythe, in St. Albans, and St. Pancras. On 12 Feb. 1609-10 his widow Judith entered a suit concerning the administration of his estate. He married, firstly, by license dated 10 Feb. 1573, Margaret Younge; his second wife, Judith, daughter of William Albany, merchant tailor of London, was buried in Highgate Chapel, 28 Jan. 1635-6. Plat left two sons and three daughters by his second marriage, and at least three sons by his first (cf. Stow, London, ed. Strype, iii. 116). William, the fourth son of his second marriage, was buried in Highgate Chapel on 11 Nov. 1687, beneath an elaborate tomb. He left land to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he had been educated as a fellow-commoner, for the maintenance of as many fellows at 30%. a year, and scholars at 10%, as the rents allowed. In 1858 the estate was merged in the general property of the College, and the three Platt fellowships, which then represented the endowment, became ordinary foundation fellowships.

[Cooper's Athense Cantabr. ii. 436-8; Hunter's Chorus Vatum in Addit. MS. 24489, f. 26; Brydges's Censura Lit. ii. 215-17; Sir John Harington's Metamorphosis of Ajax, 1596 (repr. 1824), pp. 110 sq.; Mayor's Admissions to St. John's College, Cambridge, ii. pp. lix-lxi; Johnson's Hist. of Gardening, pp. 69-70; Samuel Felton's Portraits of English Gardeners, 1830, pp. 13-15.]

PLATT, SIR THOMAS JOSHUA (1790?-1862), baron of the exchequer, born about 1790, was son of Thomas Platt of London. solicitor, who was principal clerk to three chief justices, Lords Mansfield, Kenyon, and Ellenborough, during a period of thirty years. He was educated at Harrow and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. 1810, and M.A. 1814. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple on 9 Feb. 1816, and named a king's counsellor on 27 Dec. 1834, when he became a favourite leader on the home circuit. As an advocate he was remarkable for the energy of his manner and the simplicity of his language. Before a common jury he was usually invincible, but met with fewer successes before special juries. He succeeded Baron Gurney as baron of the court of exchequer on 28 Jan. 1845, and sat until failing health obliged him to retire on 2 Nov. 1856. He was knighted at St. James's Palace on 28 April 1845. Though not deeply read, he proved a sensible judge, while his blunt courtesy and amiability made him popular with the bar. He died at 59 Portland Place, London, on 10 Feb. 1862, and was buried in Highgate cemetery. His widow Augusta died at 61 Queen's Gardens, Hyde Park, London, on 16 Feb. 1885, in her eightyninth year. By her Platt had a numerous family.

[Foss's Judges, 1864, ix. 244-5; Foss's Biographia Juridice, 1870, p. 517; Men of the Time, 1862, p. 625; Ballantine's Some Experiences, 8th edit. 1883, pp. 46, 47; Notes and Queries, 1862 iii. 26, 1890 x. 507, 1891 xi. 58, xii. 78, 238; Masters of the Bench of the Inner Temple, 1883, p. 102; Cansick's Epitaphs in Churches of St. Pancras, 1872, pp. 8, 104.] G. C. B.

PLATT, THOMAS PELL (1798-1852). orientalist, born in 1798 in London, was the son of Thomas Platt. After attending a school at Little Dunham, Norfolk, he was admitted at Trinity College, Cambridge, as pensioner on 25 Nov. 1815. He was elected scholar on S April 1818, minor fellow on 2 Oct. 1820, and major fellow on 2 July 1823. He graduated B.A. in 1820 as ninth senior optime, and M.A. in 1823. While at Cambridge he became connected with the British and Foreign Bible Society, and acted for some years as its librarian. In 1823 he published a catalogue of the Æthiopic Biblical MSS. in the Royal Library of Paris and in the library of the British and Foreign Bible Society; and in the succeeding years collated and edited for the society the Æthiopic texts of the New Testament. The object of the publication was not critical, but was 'simply to give the Abyssinians the Scriptures in as good a form of their ancient version as could be conveniently done.' Platt, however, made a few notes of the readings which particularly struck him. His notes only extended to the Gospels; for the Acts and the Epistles he used only one manuscript and Walton's text. In 1829 he also prepared an edition of the Syriac Gospels, and in 1844 edited an Amharic version of the Bible, using the translation of Abba Rukh for the Old Testament, and that of Abu Rumi Habessinus for the New.

In 1827 he defended the British and Foreign Bible Society from an attack made on their publications in the 'Quarterly Review.' In 1840, in a 'Letter to Dr. Pusey, he described his conversion from his evangelical opinions to tracturian views. He, however, protested against the application by some of the tracturians of 'mystical and spiritual interpretations to the prophecies of the Old Testament.

Platt was one of the earliest members of the Royal Asiatic Society, and for many years acted as one of its oriental translation committee. He was also a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries.

He lived for many years at Child's Hill, Hampstead, but died at Dulwich Hill, Surrey, on 81 Oct. 1852, leaving an only son, Francis Thomas Platt.

[Gent. Mag. 1852, ii. 660; Luard's Grad. Cant.; Proc. Roy. Asiatic Society and Society of Antiquaries; Morne's Introduction to Critical Study of the Holy Scriptures, 10th edit. iv. 317-320, 733; Smith's Diet. of Bible, 1868, iii. 1614; Allibone's Diet. Engl. Lit. ii. 1606; Brit. Mus. Cat.; Platt's works; information kindly supplied by the librarian of Trinity College, Cambridge.] G. Le G. N.

PLATTES, GABRIEL (A. 1638), writer on agriculture, said to have been of Dutch extraction, was one of the earliest advocates in England of an improved system of husbandry, and devoted much time and money to practical experiments. In 1639 he stated that he 'was not necessitated to make begging letters, though not possessed of any great estate (Discovery of Infinite Treasure, ep. ded.), but he appears to have been extremely poor, and was relieved by Samuel Hartlib, to whom he left his unpublished papers. His 'Treatise of Husbandry' (1038) throws much light on the state of agriculture and the relations of landlord and tenant during the seventeenth century. His later tracts mainly repeat under new titles the information which he first published in his 'Treatise.' Though he influenced later writers, he was neglected during his lifetime, and is said to have been found dead in the streets of London during the Commonwealth, in a state of extreme destitution (HARILIB, Legacie, 1651 pp. 125-7, 1652 pp. 87, 88). Besides the works mentioned, he wrote: 1. 'A Discoverie of Infinite Treasure, hidden since the World's Beginning. Whereunto all men, of what degree soever, are friendly invited to be sharers with the Discoverer, G. P., London, 1639, 4to. This also appeared under the title 'A Discovery of Subterraneall Treasure, viz., of all manner of mines and minerals . . . and also the art of melting, refining, and assaying of them,' London, 1639, 4to; London, 1653, 4to; another edition, with the title 'A Discovery of Subterranean Treasure, whereunto is added a real experiment whereby every ignorant man be true or counterfeit, London, 1679, 4to; reprinted in 'A Collection of scarce , Treatises upon Metals, 1739, 12mo; 1740, 12mo. 2. Observations and Improvements in Husbandry, with twenty Experiments. London, 1639, 4to. 8. 'Recreatio Agriculture,' London, 1640, 1646, 4to. 4. 'The profitable Intelligencer, communicating his knowledge for the generall good of the Commonwealth and all Posterity, &c.' [London. 1644], 4to.

[Donaldson's Agricultural Biography, p. 21; Felton's Gardeners' Portraits, London, 1830; Johnson's Hist of Gardening; Loudon's Encyclopædia of Agriculture, p. 1207; Thorold Rogers's Hist. of Agriculture and Prices, v. 55; Work and Wages, pp. 455-8.] W. A. S. H.

PLATTS, JOHN (1775-1887), unitarian divine and compiler, was born at Boston, Lincolnshire in 1775. For seven or eight years he officiated as a Calvinist minister there. but afterwards became a unitarian, and acted as a unitarian minister at Boston from 1805 to 1817. In 1817 he removed to Doncaster. Platts supplemented his small ministerial income by teaching and compiling educational works. He was also an ardent liberal politician, and was a humorous speaker. He died at Doncaster, after a long illness, on 19 June 1837. His widow died in 1851, leaving five daughters.

In 1825 Platts published five volumes of 'A new Universal Biography,' containing lives of eminent persons in all ages and countries, arranged in chronological order, This work, with alphabetical index. founded largely on Aikin and Chalmers, extended only to the end of the sixteenth century; the rest remained in manuscript. In 1827 appeared, in 4to, Platts's 'New Selfinterpreting Testament, containing many thousands of various Readings and Parallel Passages collected from the most approved Translators and Biblical Critics.' In the preface the author claims to have combined Rural Dwellings, calculated for persons of the merits of Francis Fox [q. v.] and Clement Cruttwell [q. v.] The commentary is free from sectarian bias. Another edition, in 4 vols. 8vo, appeared in 1830.

Platts also published: 1. 'Reflections on Materialism, Immaterialism, the Sleep of the Soul . . . and the Resurrection of the Body; being an Attempt to prove that the Resurrection commences at Death, Boston, 1813. 2. 'Letter to a Young Man, on his renouncing the Christian Religion and becoming a Deist,' 1820. 3. 'The Literary and Scientific Class-book,' &c., 1821, 12mo; a selection was published by L. W. Leonard in 1826. 4. 'Elements of Ecclesiastical History (1921) 21.

tory' [1821?] 5. 'The Book of Curiosities; with an Appendix of entertaining and periments and Recreations'(a few 8vo; a seventh American edition appeared at Philadelphia in 1856. 6. The Female Mentor, or Ladies' Class-book; being a new Selection of 365 Reading Lessons, &c., Derby, 1823, 8vo. 7. 'A Dictionary of English Synonymes' (for the use of schools), 1825, 12mo. 8. 'The Manners and Customs of all Nations' (engravings), 1827, 8vo.

[Information kindly supplied by the Rev. H. Thomas of Doncaster; Hatfield's Historical Notices of Doncaster; Christian Reformer, August 1837; Platts's works; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. ix. 264; Allibone's Dict. Engl. Lit. ii. 1607; Brit. Mus. Cat.] G. LE G. N.

PLAW, JOHN (1745?-1820), architect, born about 1745, was an architect and masterbuilder in Westminster in good practice. He built the new church at Paddington (1788-91), and Mrs. Montagu's house in Portman Square (1790), from the designs of James Stuart. He was a member of the Incorporated Society of Artists, and signed their declaration roll in 1766. He first exhibited architectural designs with them in 1778; and in 1790, when the society resumed their exhibitions after an interval of seven years, Plaw was their director, exhibiting that year and at their final exhibi-tion in 1791. He also exhibited occasionally at the Royal Academy, his name appearing for the last time in 1800. In 1795 he removed to Southampton, where he built the barracks (1806). Plaw published in 1785 'Rural Architecture; or Designs from the simple Cottage to the decorated Villa;' later editions of this work appeared in 1794, 1796, and 1802. In 1795 he published 'Ferme Ornée; or Rural Improvements. A Series of Domestic and Ornamental Designs, suited Parks . . . Farms, &c., of which a later edition appeared in 1818; and in 1800 · Sketches for Country Houses, Villas, and moderate income and for a comfortable retirement; also some Designs for Cottages, which may be constructed of the simplest materials.' All these works were illustrated by Plaw's own designs. In 1820 Plaw made an expedition to Canada, and died in May of that year on the banks of the river St. Lawrence. John Buonarotti Papworth [q v.] was his pupil. A Miss P. Plaw, apparently a daughter of the above, exhibited architectural designs with the Society of Artists in 1790.

[Dict. of Architecture (Architect. Publication Soc.); Graves's Diet. of Artists, 1760-1893; Catalogues of the Soc. of Artists and Royal Academy; South Kensington Cat. of Works on PLAYER, STR THOMAS (1608-1672), chamberlain of London, born in 1608, was son of Robert Player of Canterbury. He matriculated from St. Alban Hall, Oxford, on 3 Feb. 1625-6, graduating B.A. on 26 Jan. 1629-30, and M.A. on 11 April 1633 (FOSTER, Alumni O.conienses, 1500-1714). Player was one of the leading residents in Hackney, where he had a large house in Mare Street, and he soon occupied a prominent position in the city. He became a member of the Haberdashers' Company, and was elected by the livery chamberlain of London on 20 Oct. 1651 (City Record Common Hall Book, No. 3, f. 124). On 5 July 1660 he was, together with his son Thomas, knighted by Charles II at the Guildhall, and on 25 Oct. 1664 he was, as chamberlain, appointed official collector of the hearth-tax, which was to be devoted to the repayment of the 100,000/. lent by the city to the king, with interest at six per cent. Pepys records an interview which he and Lord Brouncker had with Player, 'a man I have much heard of,' respecting the credit of their tally, which had been lodged at the chamber of London as security for loans to the navy. Player was buried at Hackney church on 9 Dec. 1672. His wife Rebecca predeceased him, and was buried at Hackney on 4 Oct. 1667.

Their only son, SIR THOMAS PLAYER, (d. 1686), succeeded to the post of chamberlain of London on the resignation of his father on 13 Nov. 1672 (City Records, Repertory 78, ff. 14, 14 b). He wasin 1642 one of the two captains, and subsequently became colonel, of the yellow regiment of the trained bands. He was also an active member of the Honourable Artillery Company, of which he was appointed leader in 1669. He held the post until 1677, when the Duke of York took exception to his re-election, and no leader was ever after elected. He was one of the city members, both in the Westminster and Oxford parliaments (1678, 1679, and 1680-1), and helped to inflame public opinion respecting the 'popish plot' in the autumn of 1678 by stating in the house that protestant citizens might expect to wake up any morning with their throats cut. When, on an alarm of the king's illness, the Duke of York unexpectedly returned from Brussels in August 1679, Player led a deputation to the lord mayor to express fear of the papists, and to ask that the city guards should be doubled. In January 1682 he was included in the committee formed to contest the quo warranto brought against the charter of the city, and in October of the same year he was nominated a whig member of the committee appointed to inspect the poll at the election for the mayoralty. In June 1683 he was fined five hundred marks for participation in a riot at the Guildhall at the election of sheriffs on midsummer-day 1682 [see Pilkington, SIR THOMAS. Three months later he laid down his office of chamberlain. Player was accused of libertinism in a pasquinade entitled 'The Last Will and Testament of the Charter of London, 1683,' and in the second part of 'Absalom and Achitophel' Dryden gibbeted him among other prominent city politicians in the lines:

Next him, let railing Rabshakeh have place, So full of zeal he hath no need of grace; A saint that can both flesh and spirit use, Aliko haunt conventicles and the stews.

He died in the early part of January 1686, and was buried at Hackney beside his father on 20 Jan. His widow, 'the lady Joice Player,' was buried there on 8 Dec. in the same year.

[Foster's Alumni Oxon.; State Papers, Dom. 1652, 1653, 1654, 1658, 1659, 1664-5, passim; State Papers, Colonial, America, and West Indies, 1669-74; Luttroll's Brief Historical Relation, passim; Echuri's Hist. of England, iii. 671; Lysone's Envirous, ii. 497; Sharpe's London and the Kingdom, ii. 453; Dr. W. Sparrow Simpson's St. Paul's and Old City Life, 1894; R. Simpson's St. Paul's and Old City Life, 1894; R. Simpson's St. Paul's and Old City Life, 1894; R. Simpson's Monuments of St. John's, Hackney, i. 106; Ruikee's Hist. of the Hon. Artillery Company, i. 137, 195; Le Neve's Pedigrees of the Knights; Somers Tracts, ed. Scott, viii. 302; Members of Parliament, Official Lists, i. 536, 542, 548; Dryden's Works, ed. Scott; Twelve Bad Men, ed. Seecombe, p. 98; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. vi. 133.]

PLAYFAIR, SIR HUGIILYON (1786-1861), Indian officer and provost of St. Andrews, was the third son of Dr. James Playfair [q. v.] He was born on 17 Nov. London on 1 June 1817. On 1 Sept. 1818 he 1786 at Meigle, a village of Last Perthshire, was promoted captain. He spent the next where his father was minister, and was three years in extensive travels in Scotland, educated at the grammar school of Dundee, whence he proceeded to St. Andrews. In June 1804 he obtained a commission as cadet in the artillery branch of the East India Company's Bengal army, and went to Edinburgh, where he studied mathematics for three months. In April 1804 he proceeded to Woolwich to obtain technical instruction. He passed out of Woolwich on 8 Jan. 1805, and on 8 March 1805 he sailed for Calcutta, where he arrived in the August following. He had been gazetted lieutenant on 14 May 1805.

Playfair remained at Calcutta, engaged in perfecting himself in military knowledge, till November 1806, when he was sent in command of a detachment of European artillery proceeding to the upper provinces. He obtained much commendation for having conducted his troops the whole distance of eight hundred miles to Cawnpore without having had a single man invalided or sentenced to punishment. On 22 March 1807 General Sir John Horsford appointed him to the command of the artillery at Bareilly. He greatly improved the discipline and condition of the troops there stationed, and succeeded in suppressing a robber chief in Oudh, named Tumon Singh. In November 1807 Playfair was appointed to the horse artillery and sent to Agra; and in January 1809 he marched to join the army at Saharunpoor. under Generals St. Leger and Robert (afterwards Sir Robert) Gillespie [q. v.] In February 1809 he was sent forward to Sirhind and Lascarrie, where he took part in several skirmishes with the sikhs. He returned to Agra in April 1809, and on 5 Nov. was appointed adjutant and quartermaster to the increased corps of horse artillery, 'as the fittest officer in his regiment.' He was removed to Meerut in March 1811, where the horse artillery was then stationed. In the autumn of 1814, General Gillespie, commanding Playfair's division, was sent up north from Meerut to attack the Kalunga or fortress of Nalapani, a stronghold of the marauding goorkhas. Gillespie was killed in the first attempted assault; Playfair's artillery corps was therefore ordered up, the batteries were opened, and the fortress capitulated on 30 Nov. 1814. During the bombardment Playfair was twice wounded. On 5 Oct. 1815 he was promoted to be captain of horse-artillery. In 1817 Playfair, owing to ill-health, obtained furlough and sailed for Europe. On the way he touched at St. Helena, and had an interview with the ex-emperor Napoleon I. He reached

Ireland, and the western countries of Europe. In 1820 he revisited St. Andrews, received the freedom of the city, and married the daughter of William Dalgleish, of Scotscraig, Fifeshire; and in the summer of that year he returned to India. He was offered the command of a troop of horse by the Marquis of Hastings, then governor-general, but declined it; soliciting and obtaining in its stead the appointment of superintendent of the great military road, telegraph towers, and post-office department between Calcutta and Benares. He discharged the duties of this post with great efficiency till June 1827, when he was promoted to be major, and was ordered to assume the command of the 4th battalion of artillery at Dum-Dum. He resigned his command on 4 July 1831, and in the autumn of that year set out for England, where he arrived on 14 March 1832. On 10 Feb. 1884 he resigned the service of the East India Company.

Playfair now settled down permanently at St. Andrews, with the municipal history of which place the rest of his life is exclusively concerned. In 1842 he was elected provost, an office he held without intermission till his death. He was an energetic reformer in municipal affairs, and the city of St. Andrews owes to him all its modern improvements. He was much interested in educational matters, established a public library, and by his personal exertions secured government grants which enabled the university of St. Andrews to carry outlong-projected improvements. Lastly, Playfair enjoys the fame of having revived and put on a firm basis the celebrated golf club, to which St. Andrews owes its chief fame as a popular resort. Though the vast majority of Playfair's schemes were carried through, yet he encountered much obloquy and opposition. In 1847 his portrait, by Sir J. Watson Gordon, was placed in the old town hall; in 1856 the university of St. Andrews conferred on him the degree of LL.D., and in the same year he was knighted. Playfair died at St. Andrews on 21 Jan. 1861, and his remains were accorded a public funeral. Lyon, first Lord Playfair [see SUPPL.], was son of Sir Hugh's eldest brother, George.

[Louden's Biographical Sketch of Sir Hugh Lyon Playfair; Sir Hugh Playfair and St. Andrews (anon.); Gent. Mag. 1861, pt. i. p. 333; Dodwell and Miles's Indian Army List; St. Andrews Public Records; and numerous articles in the Scotsman and the Fifeshire Journal G. P. M_v.

PLAYFAIR, JAMES (1738-1819), prin-

Perthshire, by his wife Jean Roger, was born on 19 Dec. 1738. After studying at the university of St. Andrews, he obtained license as a probationer on 1 Nov. 1770, and was ordained to the pastoral charge of Newtyle. On 19 June 1777 he was translated to the neighbouring parish of Meigle. He received the degree of doctor of divinity from the university of St. Andrews on 2 July 1779, and was repeatedly invited to preside as moderator of the General Assembly, an honour which he declined. On 20 Aug. 1800 he was appointed principal of the United College, St. Andrews, and minister of the church of St. Leonard's in that city. For many years he held the appointment of historiographer to the Prince of Wales. He died at Dalmarnock, near Glasgow, on 26 May 1819. He married, on 30 Sept. 1773, Margaret, elder daughter of the Rev. George Lyon of Wester Ogle in Forfarshire. She died at St. Andrews on 4 Nov. 1831. By her Playfair left four sons—of whom the three elder joined the H. E. I. C. S.—viz.: George, doctor of medicine, inspector-general of hospitals in Bengal, and father of Baron Playfair; Colonel William Davidson Playfair; Lieutenant-colonel Sir Hugh Lyon Playfair [q. v.] The youngest son, James, was a merchant in Glasgow. Of Playfair's two daughters the elder married Patrick Playfair; and Janet, the younger, James Macdonald, Anstruther Wester.

Playfair wrote accounts of the parishes of Meigle, Essie, and Nevay for Sir John Sinclair's 'Statistical Account of Scotland.' He was also the author of: 1. 'System of Chronology,' Edinburgh, 1784, fol. 2. 'System of Geography Ancient and Modern,' 6 vols. Edinburgh, 1810-14, 4to. 3. General Atlas, Ancient and Modern,' London, 1814, fol. 4. 'Geographical and Statistical Description of Scotland,' 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1819, 8vo.

[Rogers's Four Perthshire Families; Rogers's History of St. Andrews; Scott's Fasti, pt. iv. p.

PLAYFAIR, JOHN (1748-1819), mathematician and geologist, born at Benvie, near Dundee, on 10 March 1748, was eldest son of James Playfair, minister of Liff and Benvie, by his wife, Margaret Young. William Playfair [q. v.] was his brother. He was educated at home till the age of fourteen, when he was sent to St. Andrews. He graduated in 1765. In 1766, being only eighteen, he contended for the mathematical chair in the Marischal College, Aberdeen, and came out third in the competition. He then completed his theological course at St. cipal of St. Andrews, second son of George Mary's College, and was licensed by the Playfair, a farmer of West Bendochy in presbytery as a minister in 1770. In 1769 he proceeded to Edinburgh, and in 1772 was Letters in Europe,' in Supplement to the an unsuccessful canadate for the professorship of natural philosophy at St. Andrews. The same year, owing to the death of his father, the burden of supporting the family devolved upon him, and he applied to Lord Gray, the patron, for his father's livings of Liff and Benvie, into which, however, on account of legal difficulties, he was not inducted till August 1773. He was elected moderator of synod on 20 April 1774. At Liff he remained till 1782, resigning the living in January 1783 in order to undertake the education of Mr. Ferguson of Raith and his brother, Sir Ronald Ferguson. He was in charge of these pupils till 1787.

In 1785 he became joint professor of mathematics with Dr. Adam Ferguson in the university of Edinburgh, and in 1805 exchanged his mathematical chair for the professorship of natural philosophy in the same university. Playfair vigorously defended in 1806 the appointment of Mr. (afterwards Sir) John Leslie [q.v.] as his successor to the mathematical professorship. After the peace of 1815 Playfair made a long tour through France and Switzerland to Italy, principally with the object of studying their geological and mineralogical features.

Playfair died at Edinburgh on 20 July 1819. He was one of the original members of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of which he became secretary to the physical class in 1789, and subsequently general secretary. The latter post he held till his death. For some years he assisted in the publication of the society's 'Transactions.' He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1807.

Playfair's principal mathematical work was his 'Elements of Geometry,' 8vo, Edinburgh, 1795, which attained its eleventh edition in 1859; but the work which will always be most prominently associated with his name is the 'Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth,' 8vo, Edinburgh, 1802, on which he spent five years. This work is a model of purity of diction, simplicity of style, and clearness of explanation. It not only gave popularity to Hutton's theory, but helped to create the modern science of geology.

His other works include: 1. 'Letter to the Author of the Examination of Professor low as agent to the Scioto (Ohio) land com-Stewart's Short Statement of Facts relative pany. Some hundreds of unfortunate to the Election of Professor Leslie,' 8vo, Edinburgh, 1800. 2. Outlines of Natural Philosophy, 8vo, Edinburgh, 1812 (2nd edit. of vol. ii, in 1816, and 3rd edit. of vol. i. in 1819). 3. Dissertation . . . exhibiting a Ge-Bastille, for he was among the eleven or neral View of the Progress of Mathematical twelve hundred inhabitants of the St.

4th, 5th, and 6th editions of the Encyclo-padia Britannica, 4to, Edinburgh, 1824 (reissued in 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' 7th edit. 1842, 8th edit. 1853).

He was also author of seventeen papers (including two written conjointly with others) on mathematics, natural philosophy, and geology in the 'Philosophical Transactions,' in the 'Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh,' and other scientific publications, as well as of a 'Biographical Account of J. Hutton' in the 'Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh.' A collected edition of his works, in 4 vols. edited by James G. Playfair, was issued in 1822.

Two portraits of Playfair are in the National Portrait Gallery, Edinburgh, one painted by William Nicholson, R.S.A., the other a bust by Sir Francis Chantrey, which was engraved on wood by George Pearson for Sir Alexander Grant's 'Story of the University of Edinburgh, 1884. A small portrait of him is preserved in the rooms of the Geological Society at Burlington House.

[Memoir prefixed to the Works; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Royal Soc. Cat.; Brit. Mus. Cat.; Hew Scott's Fasti, pt. vi. pp. 710-11; Cockburn's Memorials, 1856, passim.] B. B. W.

PLAYFAIR, WILLIAM (1759-1823). publicist, was the fourth son of the Rev. James Playfair of Benvie, near Dundee. where he was born in 1759. His father dying in 1772, his elder brother, John Playfair [q.v.], the geologist, took charge of the family, and apprenticed him to Andrew Meikle [q.v.] of Prestonkirk, the inventor of the threshingmachine. Rennie was a fellow-apprentice. In 1780 Playfair became draughtsman to Boulton & Watt at Birmingham. On leaving their service he took out a patent for a so-called Eldorado sash composed of copper, zinc, and iron, also for a machine for making the fretwork of silver teatrays and sugar-tongs, and for buckles, horseshoes, and coach ornaments. He opened a shop in London for the sale of these articles, but, not succeeding in this business, he went over to Paris. There he obtained a patent for a rolling mill, and in 1789 succeeded Joel Barfamilies were lured to destruction by the picture of a salubrious climate and fertile soil' (Gouverneur Morris, Diary). probably assisted in the capture of the and Physical Science since the Revival of Antoine quarter who had on the previous day formed themselves into a militia, and most of them joined in the attack (LECOCQ, Prise de la Bastille). In February 1791 he rescued from the mobin the Palais Royal Gardens the well-known ex-judge Duval d'Esprémesnil, who had been a subscriber to the Scioto company. Whether on account of alleged mismanagement in the company's agency, or, as he himself says, of his plainspeaking against the revolutionists, Playfair quitted France, and while at Frankfort, about 1793, he heard from a French émigré an account of the semaphore telegraph. thoroughly did he understand the apparatus that next day he made models of it, which he sent to the Duke of York. He henceforth claimed to have introduced the semaphore into England, but the credit, both for its invention and adoption in the United Kingdom properly belongs to Richard Lovell Edgeworth [q.v.] On returning to London Playfair opened a so-called security bank, intended to facilitate small loans by subdividing large securities, but this soon In 1795 Playfair, henceforth collapsed. living by his pen, began writing vehemently against the French revolution, advocating the issue of forged assignats as a legitimate and effective weapon. He claimed credit for having given the British government some months' warning of Napoleon's intended escape from Elba. After Waterloo he returned to Paris as editor of 'Galignani's Messenger,' but in 1818 some comments on a duel between Colonel Duffay and Comte de St. Morys led to a prosecution by the widow and daughter of the latter, and Playfair, aggravating his offence by a plea of justification, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with three hundred francs fine and one thousand francs damages. To avoid incarceration he left France, and spent the rest of his life in London, earning a precarious livelihood by pamphlets and translations. He died on 11 Feb. 1823, leaving a widow and four children.

A list of forty of his works appears in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' 1823 (pt. i. p. 564), the 'Edinburgh Annual Register,' 1823, and the 'Annual Biography,' 1824; and it is added that pamphlets would swell the number to at least a hundred. His chief productions are the 'Statistical Breviary and Atlas,' 1786; 'History of Jacobinism,' 1793; 'Inquiry into the Decline and Fall of Nations,' 1805; an annotated edition of Smith's 'Wealth of Nations,' 1806; 'A Statistical Account of the United States of America,' 1807; 'Political Portraits in this New Æra,' 2 vols. 1814; and 'France as it is,' 1819, which was transluted into French in the following year.

[Short Biography in the three books above mentioned, Playfair's France as it is, not Lady Morgan's, 1819; Louis Blane's Révolution Française; Moniteur, 1818 (indexed as 'Pleffer'); Alger's Englishmen in French Revolution; Mag. of American History, 1889; Rev. Charles Rogers's Four Perthshire Families, 1887.]

J. G. A.

PLAYFAIR, WILLIAM HENRY (1789-1857), architect, born in Russell Square, London, in July 1789, was son of James Playfair, an architect of some repute in London, who in 1788 published 'A Method of constructing Vapor Baths, and nephew of Professor John Playfair [q. v.] In 1794 Playfair came to reside with his uncle, the professor, in Edinburgh, and followed his father's profession of an architect. studying under William Starke (d. 1813) [q.v.] of Glasgow. He gained some considerable private practice in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, but his first public employment was the laying out in 1815 of part of the new town in Edinburgh; in 1820 he designed the Royal and Regent Terraces in the same part; and in 1819 a new gateway and lodge for Heriot's Hospital. From 1817 to 1824 Playfair was engaged in rebuilding and enlarging the university buildings, leaving, however, the front as designed by Robert and James Adam. Other important buildings designed by Playfair at Edinburgh were the Observatory, the Advocates' Library, the Royal Institution, the College of Surgeons, St. Stephen's Church, and the Free Church College. From 1842-8 he was engaged in constructing Donaldson's Hospital in the Tudor style, a building which is reckoned as his most successful work. He designed the monument to his uncle, Professor Playfair, and that to Dugald Stewart on the Calton Hill, the latter being modelled on the monument of Lysicrates at Athens. Some of his most important works in Edinburgh were executed in the purely classical style, among them being the National Gallery of Scotland, the first stone of which was laid by the prince consort on 30 Aug. 1850, and the unfinished national monument on the Calton Hill, for which the original design was supplied by Charles Robert Cockerell, R.A. [q.v.] Playfair's classical buildings are predominant objects in any view of modern Edinburgh, and have gained for it the sobriquet of the 'Modern Athens.' It may be doubted, however, whether the classical style is thoroughly suited to the naturally picturesque and romantic aspect of the northern capital.

Playfair had also a very extensive private practice, and built many country houses and mansions in the classical or Tudor styles, to which he nearly always adhered. He died in Edinburgh, after a very long illness, on 19 March 1857.

[Dict. of Architecture; Scotsman, 21 March 1857; Building News, 1857, iii. 359-60; Lord Cockburu's Memoirs.] L. C.

PLAYFERE, THOMAS (1561?-1609) divine, born in London about 1561, was son of William Playfere and Alice, daughter of William Wood of 'Bolling' in Kent. He matriculated as a pensioner of St. John's College, Cambridge, in December 1576, and on 5 Nov. 1579 was admitted a scholar on the Lady Margaret's foundation. He graduated B.A. in 1579-80, M.A. in 1583, B.D. in 1590, and D.D. in 1596 (cf. State Papers, Dom. Addenda, xxvii. 72). On 10 April 1584 he was admitted a fellow on the Lady Margaret's foundation. He contributed to the university collection of Latin elegies on Sir Philip Sidney (16 Feb. 1586-7). IIe served the college offices of predoctor topious, 1587; rhetoric examiner, 1588, medical lecturer on Dr. Linacre's foundation; preacher, 1591; Ilebrew prelector, 1593-4; senior fellow and senior dean, 1598; and principal lecturer, 1000. According to Foster (Alumni O. on.), he joined the Inner Temple in 1594, and in 1596 he was incorporated D.D. at Oxford. After the death of Dr. Whitaker, master of St. John's, Playfere and Clayton were caudidates for the mastership, and Clayton was chosen. In December 1596 Playfere was elected Lady Margaret professor of divinity. He became chaplain to King James, and often preached before him at court. He also preached before Prince Henry at Greenwich on 12 March 1604-5, and before the kings of England and Denmark at Theobalds, then the residence of the Earl of Salisbury, on 27 July 1600. The latter sermon, in Latin, was published.

Playfere held the crown living of Cheam in Surrey from 1605 to 1609. In 1608 he became rector of All Saints, in Shipdham, and of Thorpe, Norfolk (Blombeteld, Norfolk, x. 247). On 4 Nov. 1602 Chamberlain had written to Carleton that 'Dr. Plafer, the divinity reader, is crazed for love' (State Papers, Dom. cclxxxv. 48), and after 1606 l'hayfere's mind gave way, but he held his professorship until his death, on 2 Feb. 1608-1609. His reputation as a fluent preacher in Latin was high, but, says Thomas Baker, 'had his sermons never been printed he had left a greater name behind.' His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Thomas Jegon. vice-chancellor; John Williams, then a fellow of St. John's, afterwards lord keeper, pronounced an eloquent oration on him in the college chapel. He was buried in the church of St. Botolph, Cambridge, where a monument with his bust, and a panegyrical inscription was placed by desire of his wife Alicia.

Playfere published various single sermons during his lifetime, and after his death appeared: 'Ton Sermons,' Cambridge, 1610; a volume (1611), containing four sermons (including 'The Pathway to Perfection'), each sermon with a separate title-page, and wanting a general title; 'Nine Sermons,' Cambridge, 1612, dedicated to Sir Reynold Argal. 'The whole sermons gathered into one volume' were issued at London in 1623 and 1638.

[Hist, MSS. Comm. 3rd Rep. p. 174, 6th Rep. p. 270 l; Foster's Alumni Oxon. (incorrectly makes him rector of Ruan-Lanihornein Cornwall, 1605-10), Lansd. MS. 983, f. 129; Wood's Fasti, i. 271; Baker's Hist. of St. John's, pp. 190, 194; Cooper's Annals of Cambridge, in. 431, 564; Cooper's Annals of Cambridge, ii. 479; Fuller's Worthies, 'Kent;' Nichols's Progresses of James I, iii. 1073; Rymer's edit. of Fisher's Lady Margaret Sermons, p. 73; Hacket's Scrivit Reserata, i. 10, 18; Puritan Transactions at Cambridge, ii. 15; Fuller's Worthies; Cooper's Athense Cant.]

PLAYFORD, JOHN (1623-1686?) musician and publisher, the younger son of John Playford of Norwich, was born in 162:1, He became known as a music publisher in London about 1648 (HAWKINS), and from February 1651-2 until his retirement his shop was in the Inner Temple near the church Playford was clerk to the Temple door. Church, and probably resided with his wife Hannah over the shop until 1659. He was, it appears from the title-pages of his publications, temporarily in partnership with John Benson in 1652, and with Zachariah Watkins in 1664 and 1665. Under the Commonwealth, and for some years of Charles II's reign, Playford almost monopolised the business of music publishing in this country. His shop was the meeting-place of musical enthuniasts; Pepys was a frequent customer. Although he published separately the works of the chief composers of the day, Playford's fame mainly rested on his collected volumes of songs and catches. He showed in his choice of publications a welcome freedom from prevailing prejudices. He issued 'The Dancing Master 'during the Commonwealth, and the result justified his courage. In Restoration days, on the other hand, he endeavoured to encourage serious tastos. In 1662 he dedicated the 'Cantica Sacra' to Queen Henrietta Maria. He regretfully observed in 1066 that 'all solemn musick was much laid aside, being esteemed too heavy and dull for the light heels and brains of this nimble and wanton age,' and he therefore ventured to 'new string the harp of David' by issuing fresh editions of his 'Skill of Music,' with music for church service, in 1674, and in 1677 'The Whole Book of Psalms,' in which he gave for the first time the church tunes to the cautus part. In typographical technique Playford's most original improvement was the invention in 1658 of 'the new-ty'd note.' These were quavers or semiquavers connected in pairs or series by one or two horizontal strokes at the end of their tails, the last note of the group retaining in the early examples the characteristic up-stroke. Hawkins observes that the Dutch printers were the first to follow the lead in this detail. In 1665 he caused every semibreve to be burred in the dance tunes; in 1672 he began engraving on copper-plates. Generally, however, Playford clung to old methods; he recommended the use of the lute tablature to ordinary violinplayers; and he resisted, in an earnest letter of remonstrance (1673), Salmon's proposals for a readjustment of cless. Playford's printers were: Thomas Harper, 1648-1652; William Godbid, 1658-1678; Ann Godbid and her partner, John Playford the younger, 1679–1083; John Playford alone, 1684–1685.

By 1665 Playford and his wife had removed from the Temple to a large house opposite Islington Church, where Mrs. Playford kept a boarding-school until her death in October 1679. In that year the school was advertised in the second book of Playford's 'Choice Ayres; 'in 1680 it was announced for sale in ' Mercurius Anglicus' of 5-8 May (cf. SMITH, Protestant Intelligence, 11-14 April 1681), In the meantime, by November 1680, Playford had established himself in a house in Arundel Street ' near the Thames side, the lower end, over against the George.' He suffered from a long illness in that year, and, feeling his age and infirmities, he left the cares of business to his son Henry (see below), but not without a promise of assistance from himself. He brought out, in his own name, a collection of catches in 1685; 'The Dancing Master' of 1686 was the last work for which he was responsible. He apparently died in Arundel Street about November 1686. His will was written on 5 Nov 1686, neither signed nor witnessed, and only proved in August 1694, the handwriting being identified by witnesses. He was probably buried in the Temple Church as he desired, although the registers do not record his name. Henry Purcell and Dr. Blow attended the funeral. Several elegies upon his death were published; one written by Nahum Tate, and set to music by Henry Purcell, appeared in 1087.

Portraits of Playford are published with several editions of 'A Brief Introduction:' (1) at the age of thirty-eight, by R. Gaywood, 12mo, 1600; (2) aged 40, the same plate, retouched, 12mo, 1603 ('Introduction' of 1664 and 1606); (3) aged 47, by Van Hoe, 1669, (4) the same, retouched, 1669 ('Introduction' of 1670 and 1672); (5) aged 57, by Loggan, 1680 ('Introduction' of 1687); (6) Hawkins prints a poor engraving by Grignion in his 'History,' p. 733 (BROMLEY, Cat. Engrared Portraits).

Playford's original compositions were very few and slight. His vocal pieces, in 'Catch . . . or the Musical Companion,' 1667, are: 'Carolus, Catherina;' 'Fra queste piante;' 'Though the Tyrant;' 'Come let us sit,' a 4; 'Diogenes was Merry;' 'Come, Damon;' 'Cease, Damon;' 'Cupid is mounted;' 'Huc ad Regem Pastorum,' a 3. 'When Esir Cloris' is in the 'Musical Compassion'. Fair Cloris' is in the 'Musical Companion,' 1673; 'Methinks the Poor Town' in Choice Songs, 1673. 'Laudate Dominum,' Out of the Deep, 'O be Joyful,' I am well pleased,' O Lord, Thou hast brought up my Soul,' appeared in 'Cantica Sacra,' 1674, and several tunes by Playford in 'The Whole Book of Psalms.' 'Comely Swain,' a 3, was printed in 'The Harmonicon,' vi. 120.

The distinct works of composers which Playford published may be found under the composers' names. The chief volumes of collective music for which he was responsible are: 1. 'The English Dancing Master,' entered at Stationers' Hall, 1650; 'The Dancing Master,' second edition, 1652; another, probably the third edition, was advertised in 1657, apparently reprinted 1665, with the tunes which afterwards formed the first edition of 'Apollo's Banquet; editions followed in 1670, 1675, 1679, and the seventh in 1086; by Playford's son, Henry, in 1690, 1695, second part, 1696, 1698, 1701; twelfth edition in 1703, after which it passed into other hands. reaching the seventeenth edition in 1728.

2. 'The Musical Banquet,' in four tracts: i. 'Rules for Song and Viol' (afterwards developed into 'A Brief Introduction,' &c.); 'Thirty Lessons . . . ' (afterwards 'Musich's Recreation on the Lyra-Violl'); iii. 'Twenty-seven Lessons of Two Parts' (afterwards 'Court Ayres'); iv. 'Twenty Rounds or Catches' (afterwards 'Catch that catch can'), about 1650. 3. 'A Book of New Lessons for the Cithern and Gittern. about 1652 and 1659, reprinted 1675, 'Musick's Delight on the Cithern,' 1666. 4. 'Catch that catch can, or a Choice Collection of Catches, Rounds, and Canons for Three or Four Voyces, collected and pullished by John Hilton,' 1652; second edition, corrected and enlarged by John Playford, 1658, 1663; 'Oatch . . ., &c., or the Musical Companion, to which is added a Second Book contayning Dialogues, Glees, Ayres, and Ballads, for Two, Three, and Four Voyces,' 1667; 'The Musical Companion, in Two Books: I. Catches . . .; II. Dialogues . . . 1073 (the second book dated 1672); 'Catch that eatch can, or the second part of the Musical Companion,' contains seventy new catches and songs, 1685; 'The Second Book of the Pleasant Musical Companion,' 2nd ed. 1686, a reprint, 1687. Henry Playford published a fifth edition, 'Pleasant Musical Companion, 1707; other publishers issued later editions, including the tenth, 1726. 5. 'Musick's Recreation on the Lyra-Viol,' in lute tablature, 1652, 1656; '... on the Viol, Lyraway, 1661, 1669, 1682; there was announced in 1674 'Musick's Recreation on the Bass-Viol, Lyra-way.' 6. 'Select Musical Ayres and Dialogues for One and Two Voyces to sing to the Theorbo-Lute or Bass-Violi... in two books, 1652; in three books, 1653; other editions, 'Select Ayres,' 1659, second book and third book, consisting chiefly of compositions by Honry Lawes, and reprinted as the second and third books of 'The Treasury of Musick,' 1669. 7. 'Court Ayros or Pavins, Almains, Corants, and Sarabands of two parts, Treble and Bass, for Viols and for Violins, which may be performed in Consort to the Theorbo-Lute or Virginalls, obl. 8vo, 1655; 'Courtly Masquing Ayres . . .' two books in 4to, 1664. 8. 'A Brief Introduction to the Skill of Music for Song and Viol,' in two books, 8vo; 2nd ed. 1658; third edition, enlarged, with portrait, 'A Brief Introduction . . . to which is added a third book, entituled The Art of Setting or Composing Musick in Parts, by Dr. Thomas Campion, with Annotations thereon by Mr. Christopher Simpson, 1660, 1602, 1604, 1686, 'An Introduction, 1672; 'With the Order of Singing Divine Service,' 1674, 1679; 10th ed. 1683; by Henry Playford, 11th ed. 1687, 1694; 'With the Art of Descant,' by H. Purcell, 1697; 14th ed. 1700; 15th ed. 1703, continued by other publishers to 19th ed. 1780. 9. 'Cantica Sacra,' Dering's Latin anthems, first set, 1662; second set, Latin and English, by various composers, 1673, 1674. 10. 'Musick's Hand-maide, presenting New and Pleasant Lessons for the Virginalls or Harpeycon' (afterwards Harpsychord or Spinet), 1603, 1678, 1678; by Henry Playford, second book, 1689; the whole reprinted, engraven on copper-plates, 1690, 1695. 11. 'Apollo's Banquet for the Troble Violin,' 1670, 1673; with tunes of French dances, 1676; with rules, 1678; in two parts, 1685; by Henry Playford, 6th ed. 1690; 7th. 1695; 8th, with 'New Ayres and Instructions,' 1701. 12. 'The Pleasant Companion, Lossons on the Flagilet' (Greeting), 1671, 1676, 1684. 13. 'Psalms and Ilymns in Solemn Musick of Four Parts, on the Common Tunes to the Psalms in Metre, used in Parish Churches; also Six Hymns for One Voice to the Organ,' 1671. 14. 'Choice Songs and Ayres . . .,' 1673, 1075, 1676; second book, 1679; third book, 1681; collected in 3 vols. as 'Choice Banquet of Musick,' 1682; fourth book, 1688; fifth book, 1684. 15. 'The whole Book of Psalms with the usual Hymns and Spiritual Songs . . . composed in Three Parts,' 1677; by Honry Playford, 2nd ed. 1095; 8th, 1702: continued by other publishers, 20th ed. 1757. 16. 'The Delightful Companion [sometimes 'Musick's Delight'], Lessons for the Recorder or Flutc,' 1682, 17. 'The Division Violin,' 1685; 3rd ed. 1688; 4th, 1600.

After Playford's death, his only surviving son, HENRY PLAYFORD (1657-1706 P), born on 5 May 1657, and christened at the Temple Church, when Henry Lawes and an elder Henry Playford, stood godfathers, carried on the business at the shop near the Temple Church. In partnership with Robert Carr. Henry published three books of 'The Theatre of Musick; 'the fourth book and his other undertakings appeared independently of Carr. In 1694 he sold to Heptinstall his copyright in 'The Dancing Master.' From 1696 to 1703 Playford traded in the Temple Change 'over against St. Dunstan's Church in Fleet Street.' He employed as printers, John Playford the younger, 1685; Charles Peregrine, 1687; E. Jones, 1687, 1696; J. Heptinstall, 1696; William Pearson, 1698. About 1701 he instituted weekly clubs for the practice of music, which flourished in Oxford as well as in London.

Playford, in his effort to withstand the competition of purveyors of cheap music, established in 1690 a concert of music to be held three evenings in the week at a coffeehouse. Here his music was to be sold, and might be heard at the request of any prospective purchaser. He complained of the dearness of good paper, and of the scandalous abuse of selling single songs at a penny apiece, a practice 'which hindered good collections.' In 1703 Playford invited subscriptions to the 'Monthly Collections of Music' to be sent to his house in Arundel Street, Strand, 'over against the Blue Ball.' From 1708 to 1707 he seems to have engaged desultorily in selling prints, paintings, 'and other adornments.' In 1706 his warshouse was a room 'up one pair of stairs next the Queen's Head Tavern over against the Middle Temple Gate.' His name appears on the fifth edition of 'The Pleasant Musical Companion,' dated 1707, but as a rule these publications were antedated; and his name does not occur again in advertisements or on titlepages. He died between 1706 and 1721, when his will was proved. He left a legacy to Henry Purcell, and the bulk of his property to his wife Ann, daughter of Thomas Baker of Oxford, whom he married in December 1688.

His chief collective publications were: 1. 'The Theatre of Musick,' three books, 1685; fourth book, 1687. 2. 'Harmonia Sacra, first book, 1688, 1703; second book, 1693; supplement, 1700.

3. The Banquet of Musick,' a collection of songs sung at court and at publick theatres; first and second books, 1688; third and fourth books, 1689; sixth book, 1694. 4. 'The Sprightly Companion, a Collection of best Foreign Marches,' 1695. 5. Directions to learn the French Hautboy, with outlandish Marches and other Tunes, 1695. 6, Delicim Musics, a Collection of Songs, four books in one volume, 1696; first and second parts of vol. ii. 1697. 7. 'The New Treasury of Musick, a Collection of Song-books published for Twenty Years past, 1 vol. in folio, with a title-page, about 1696. 8. 'The Alamode Musician, a Collection of Songs. 9. 'Orpheus Britannicus,' 1698 [see PURCELL, 10. 'Wit and Mirth, or Pills HENRY] to purge Melancholy . . . Ballads and Songs,' 1699; second part, 1700; third book, in the press, 1702; continued by other publishers, 1712. 11. 'The Psalmody: Directions to play the Psalm Tunes by Letters instead of Notes, with an Instrument, the Invention of John Playford, 1099. 12. Mercurius Musicus, a Monthly Collection of New Teaching Songs, composed for the Theatres and other Occasions, January 1698-9, to December 1699, 1700, 1701; announced to be printed in future in single songs, with the former title. 13. Original Scotch Tunes, 1700; 2nd ed. 1701. 14. Amphion Anglicus, 1702 [see Blow, John]. 15. The Divine Companion, a Collection of Easie Hymns for One, Two, and Three Voices, 1701; editions by other publishers, 4th, 1722. 16. Announced, 'The Lady's Banquet . . Lessons for Harpsichord or Spinet,' 1702; to be continued yearly.

The music printer, JOHN PLAYFORD the younger (1656–1686), son of Matthew Playford, rector of Stanmore Magna, Middlesex, by his wife Eleanor Playford, and nephew of John Playford the elder, entered in 1679 into partnership with Ann, the widow of William Godbid, in the printing-house at Little Britain, 'the ancient and only printing-house in England for variety of musick and workmen that understand it.' It was also the chief printing-house for setting up mathematical works.

Playford's firm printed the sixth edition of 'The Dancing Master' in 1679, and other musical publications. In 1684 Mrs. Godbid's name disappeared, and Playford continued the business alone. His last work for his uncle was the seventh edition of 'The Dancing Master,' dated 1686; he printed only one of Henry's publications, 'The Theatre of Musick,' 1685. He died in that year, and was buried in Great Stanmore church, where a stone on the floor of the nave bears his name (Lysons, Environs, iii. 398). He describes himself in his will (signed 20 April, proved 29 April 1685), aa citizen and stationer of London. Playford left his property to his mother Eleanor. then married to Randolph Nichol, and to his two sisters, Anne, the wife of William Killigrew, and Eleanor, who afterwards married William Walker. The printing-house was advertised for sale in the 'London Gazette' of 6 May 1686. It included a dwelling-house, in which Eleanor, her brother's executrix, was then living.

[Manuscript notes from North Walsham Manor rolls, kindly supplied by Mr. Walter Rye; London Gazette and other papers, 1648-1709 passim; Hawkins's History of Music, pp. 687-94, 733; Burney's History of Music, iii. 59, 417, 461; Pepys's Diary, ii. 68, iv. 18; registers of Stanmore Magna, of the Temple Church, of St. Mary's, Islington, of St. Clement Danes, of St. Dunstan's, and of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; Chappell's Popular Music, vol. i. p. xvi; Lysons's Environs, iii. 398; Chester's Westminster Abbey Registers, pp. 363, 364; Marriage Licenses, Faculty Office of the Archbishop of Canterbury, p. 192; Marriage Allegations, registers of the Vicer-general of the Archbishop of Canterbury; registers of St. James's, Clerkenwell (Harleian Soc.); Hou.
Roger North's Memoires of Musick, p. 107;
Horsfield's History of Lewes, ii. 218; Foster's
Alumni Oxon. early ser. iii. 1171; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. vii. 449, 494 (for the Playford family); Grove's Dictionary of Music, iii. 2, iv. 749; Registers of Wills, P. C. C., Penn, 93, Box, 196, Cann, 48, Archdeaconry of Middlesex, December 1721; Playford's publications. Messrs. Barclay Squire and Julian Marshall have rendered assistance in the preparation of this article.]

PLEASANTS, THOMAS (1728-1818), philanthropist, was born in co. Carlow in 1728. He was educated for the bar, but did not enter on the practice of the law, of which, as well as of classical literature, he acquired an extensive knowledge. His affluent circumstances enabled him to gratify a philanthropic disposition, and he made large contributions to henevolent objects. Among his gifts were 14,000l. for a stovetenter house at Dublin, to facilitate the work of poor weavers; 6,000l. for a Dublin hospital; and 700% for buildings at a botanic gardon. In 1816 Pleasants defrayed the cost of reprinting at Dublin 'Reflections and Resolutions proper for the Gentleman of Irelaud' (1738), by Samuel Madden [q. v.]

Pleasants died on 1 March 1818, in Camden Street, Dublin, and bequeathed sums for schools, almshouses, and hospitals in Dublin. A portrait of Pleasants in oil is in the possession of the Royal Dublin Society.

A kinsman, Robert Pleasants, of James river, Virginia, at the sacrifice of more than 3,000l. liberated all his negroes in 1786.

|American Rogistor, August 1786; Annual Biogr. 1818; Gent. Mag. 1818, i. 113-16, 155, 371; Ryan's Worthies of Ireland, 1821.]
J. T. G.

PLECHELM, SAINT (A. 700), 'the apostle of Guelderland,' was an Irishman of noble birth, who received boly orders and made a pilgrimage to Rome in the company of the Irish bishop St. Wiro and the deacon St. Otgar. Having been consecrated a bishop, perhaps by Sorgius I, he returned home, and then started with St. Wire on a mission to Gaul. They were well received by Pepin, whom the Bollandists identify with Pepin Herstal, or 'The Fat' (d. 714). Pepin gave the missionaries St. Odilia's or St. Peter's Mount, called also Berg, near Ruremund, and thither he went annually to confess to them. From Ruremund many missions were sent to the provinces between the Rhine and the Meuse.

The date of St. Plechelm's death is not known; his feast is celebrated on 15 July. His relics are venerated not only at Ruremund, but also at Oldenzel in the province of Over-Yssel, and at Utrecht. F. Bosch, the Bollandist, gives a long list of writers who make Plechelm bishop of Candida Casa or Whithorn, and identical with Peethelm [q. v.], but he rejects the identification, although it is adopted by Pagi (Crit. Hist. Chron. ad an. 731) and by the author of 'Batavia Sacra.

[Acta SS. Jul. iv. 50; O'Haulon's Lives of Jush Saints, vii. 230; Forbes's Kalendars of Scottish Saints, p. 484.

PLEGMUND (d. 014), archbishop of Canterbury, a Mercian by birth, lived as a called from him Plegmundham, about five miles north-east of Chester. The island was said to have been given by Æthelwulf to Christ Church, Canterbury (Gurvase, ii. 45), and is now called Plemstall. Being famed for his learning and religious life, Plegmund was called by Ælfred to his court, and there instructed the king and helped him in his literary work. In 890 he was chosen archbishop, and, going to Rome, received the pall from Formosus, who became pope the next year. It has been supposed that he compiled and wrote the first part of the Winchester codex of the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle,' now in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in which there is a change of writing at the year 801, but this is mere supposition; nor is it certain that he resided for any length of time at the court before he became archbishop. Among the books that he helped the king to write was Elfred's version of Pope Gregory's . Regula l'astoralis;' his share in the work is acknowledged in the preface, and the copy that the king gave him is preserved, though in a much dumaged state, in the British Museum (Cott. MS. Tib. B. 11). On the death of Ælfred in 901, Plegmund is said to have crowned his son Edward at Kingston (DICITO, i. 145). William of Malmesbury (Gesta Regum, book ii. c. 129) relates, quoting and altering a narrative in Leofric's 'Missal,' that in 901 Pope Formosus wrote threatening to excommunicate Edward and all his people because for seven years the West-Saxon land had had no bishop; that Edward called a synod over which Plegmund presided, that five bishops instead of two as beforetime were chosen and set over different West-Saxon tribes, and that Plegmund consecrated seven bishops in one day at Canterbury, five for Wessex and the other two for Selsey and the Mercian Derchester. proceeds to name them. The passage is full of blunders, as, for example, the introduction of Formosus, who died in 896. The story has been critically examined by Bishop Stubbs (Gesta Regum, i. 140 n. and ii. Pref. lv-lx), and his explanation, so far as it concerns Plegmund, is, in brief, as follows. The acts and specially the ordinations of Pope Formosus were annulled in 897, the sentence being confirmed in 904. This sentence, of course, affected the posi-tion and the acts of Plegmund and the bishops whom he had consecrated. It was perhaps known -it was certainly afterwards helieved (Gesta Pontificum, pp. 59-61)that Formosus had urged that lengtish sees should be filled more quickly. The decihermit on what was in those days an island, sion of 901 made matters urgent in 905'Missal.'

well have been to obtain the necessary confirmation of his position and his acts; and he would probably also seek the pope's sanc-tion for the subdivision of the West-Saxon episcopate contemplated by him and the king. One act in this subdivision was certainly accomplished in 909; it is possible that the whole of it was carried out at the same time at a council at Winchester (Code. Diplomations, Nos. 342, 1090-6). Nor is there any reason to disbelieve that Plegmund on one day in that year consecrated soven bishops, five for Wessex and the two others for sees outside it. On his return from Rome he brought with him the relics of St. Blaise, which he had bought at a high price. He life. On 24 June 1244 he had been appointed died in old age on 2 Aug. 914, and was buried in his cathedral church.

[A.-S. Chron. ann. 890, 891, 923; Asser, ap M. H. B. p 487; Ethelweard, sp. Monumenta Historica Britannica, p. 519; Flor. Wig. an. 890 (Engl. Hist. Soc.); Will. of Malmesbury's Gesta Regum, i. 183, 140–1, ii. Pref. lv-lx and Gesta Pontiff. pp. 20, 60, 177, Gervase of Cant. i. 15, ii. 41, 350, Kalph de Diceto, i. 145 (all Rolls Ser ); Kemble's Codex Dipl. No. 322, 332, 336, 337, 342, 1090-06 (Engl. Hist. Soc.); Stubbs's Reg. Sacr. Angl pp. 12, 13; Hook's Archbishops of Canterbury, i. 312 sq.; Wright's Biogr. Lit. pp. 413-16] W. H.

PLESSIS or PLESSETIS, JOHN DE. FARL OF WARWICK (d. 1263), was of Norman origin, and was probably a son of the Hugh de Plessis who occurs as one of the royal knights from 1222 to 1227 (Cal. Rot. Claus. i. 500, ii. 131). He was possibly a grandson of the John de Plesseto who witnessed a charter of John in 1204 (GIR. CAMBR. Opera, Rolls Ser. i. 435), and was in the royal service in 1207 (Cal. Rot. Claus. i. 99, 102). Amauricius and William de Plessis, who were provided with benefices by the king's order in 1243, may have been his brothors (Rûles Gascons, Nos. 581, 1050, 1410, 1638).

Plessis is first mentioned in 1227, when he was one of four knights to whom 60l. was given for their support (ib. ii. 202). He served in Wales in 1231, and on 2 March 1232 witnessed a royal charter to Stephen de Segrave [q. v.] (Archæologia, xv. 210). ()n 30 May 1234 he was appointed warden of one of the council selected to act when the Devizes Castle and of Chippenham Forest. king was out of England (Ann. Mon. i. 460, the date of the letter, according to Leofric's, shire, and on 9 Dec. 1241 had the wardship of the heiresses of John Biset of Combe Biset, In 908 Plegmund consecrated the new Wiltshire (Hoare, Hist. Wiltshire, Cawden, minster at Winchester and paid a second visit to Rome, carrying to the pope (Sergius III) the alms sent by the king (ETHILIWIARD, Mon. i. 122). In May 1242 he accompanied the ing to Poitou (cf. Rôles Gascoas, Nos. p. 519). The main object of his visit may 482, 859, 1224). On 2 Nov. he was granted a charge wearth 301 on 23 Nov. freedom of a charger worth 30*l.*, on 23 Nov. he was granted a charger worth 30*l.*, on 23 Nov. freedom of bequest, and on 25 Dec. the marriage of Margaret de Neubourg, countess of Warwick, and widow of John Marshal, son of John Marshal (1170°-1285) [q. v.] (ib. Nos. 624, 671, 720, 911). Plessis returned to England with the limit of the shall (1170°-1285) with the king in October 1243 (ib. No. 1159). Through the royal influence his suit with Margaret de Neubourg was successful, but he did not assume the title of Earl of Warwick until his tenure of it for life was assured by the consent of the next heir, William Mauduit, father of William Mauduit [q. v.]; he is first styled earl in April 1245. On 18 Oct. 1250 he had a grant of his wife's lands for constable of the Tower of London, and it was no doubt in this capacity that he appears as one of the justices to hold the pleas of the city of London on 24 Sept. 1251. In 1252 he is mentioned as one of the royal courtiers who took the cross, and in May 1253 was one of the witnesses to the excommunication of those who broke the charters (MATT. Paris, v. 282, 375). In August 1253 he again went with Henry to Gascony, and was in the royal service there till August 1254. On 11 Feb. 1254 he was employed to treat with Gaston de Bearn, and on 5 March received 2001. in payment for his services (Rôles Gascons, Nos. 2396, 2642, 3070). He was at Bordeaux in August 1254, but, having obtained letters of safe-conduct from Louis IX, started home through Poitou early in September, in company with Gilbert de Segrave [q.v.] and William Mauduit. The party was treacherously seized by the citizens of Pons in Poitou; Segrave died in captivity, and John de Plessis was not released till the following year. In the spring of 1258 Plessis sat with John Mansel and others at the exchequer to hear certain charges against the mayor of London (Liber de Antiquis Legibus, p. 38, Camd. Soc.) At the parliament of Oxford in June 1258 he was one of the royal representatives on the committee of twentyfour, was one of the royal electors of the council of fifteen, and a member of the latter body (Ann. Mon. i. 447, 449; STUBBS, Const. Hist. ii. 84). He was appointed warden of Devizes Castle by the barons, and in 1259 was In 1239 and 1240 he was shoriff of Oxford- 478). On 28 Nov. 1259 he was a commissioner of over and terminer for the counties Quebec and professor of 'humanities' at the of Somerset, Devon, and Dorset. When Henry removed the baronial sheriffs in July 1261, Plessis was given charge of Leicestershire, and on 10 Aug. was also made warden of Devizes Castle, a post which he held till 15 June 1262. He died on 26 Feb. 1263, and was buried at Missenden Abbey, Buckinghamshire.

By his first wife, Christiana, daughter of Hugh de Sanford, he had a son Hugh (1237-1291), who married his father's ward, Isabella, daughter of John de Biset. Hugh de Plessis had a son Hugh (1266-1301), who was summoned to parliament in 1209, and left a son Hugh, who died before 1356 without male issue (HOARE, Hist. Wiltshire, Cawden, p. 12; cf. PALGRAVE, Parl. Writs, iv. 1297)

John de Plessis was succeeded as Earl of Warwick by his second wife's nephew, William Mauduit. A nephew called Hugh de Plessetis was ancestor of the family of Wroth of Wrotham, Kent (Archaelogia Cantiana, xii. 314).

There was a family of the name of Plessis or de Plessetis settled at Plessy in the township of Blyth, Northumberland. Alan do Plessis and John de Plessis were concerned in a forest dispute in Northumberland in 1241. The latter was a person of some note in the county, and was no doubt the warden of Northumberland in 1258, though Dugdale and others have erroneously assigned this office to the Earl of Warwick (Hongson, Hist. of Northumberland, II. ii, 292-6; BAIN, Calendar of Documents relating to Scotland, i. 276, 2141, 2611).

[Matthew Paris: Annales Monastici (both in Rolls Ser.); Cal. of Close Rolls; Excerpta e Rot. Finium; Rôles Gascons (Documents Inédits sur l'Hist. de France); Dugdale's Barouage, i. 772-3, and Hist. of Warwickshire, pp. 383-5; Doyle's Official Baronage, iii. 575-6; C. E. C[okayne]'s Complete Pecrage, vi. 254; Foss's Judges of England, ii. 442-4; Archæologia,

PLESSIS, JOSEPH OCTAVE (1762-1825), Roman catholic archbishop of Quebee, the son of a blacksmith, was born near Montreal on 3 March 1762. He received a classical education at Montreal College, and for a short time followed his father's trade; but, in 1780, he returned to his studies, entered the Petit Séminaire at Quebec, and became a teacher at Montreal College. Later, becoming secretary to Bishop Briand, he was ordained a priest on 11 March 1786, and was appointed secretary of Bishop Hubert at Quebec. In 1792 he was made cure of 1376. In early life he probably held office in college of St. Raphael, and in 1797 grand . vicar and coadjutor to Bishop Denault. His growing power and influence were employed against the English predominance, and the English party, led by Herman Witsius Ryland [q. v.], made vain efforts to hinder his promo-Consecrated as bishop-coadjutor on 25 Jan. 1801, he became bishop of Quebec in 1806, on the death of Denault, during the height of the discussion about the jesuit estates. An unsuccessful effort was made by Ryland and the protestant party to prevent his taking the oath of allegiance.

Plessis's position was now established. In 1810 he came into collision with the governor, Sir James Henry Craig [q.v.] But in 1812, when war with the United States broke out, he won the goodwill of the government by his efforts to rouse the loyalty of the French Canadians. In 1814 he was accordingly granted a pension of one thousand louis and a seat in the legislative council. where he proved himself an ardent champion of the rights of the Roman catholic population. In 1818 he was made archbishop of Quebrc. He set himself vigorously to organise the Roman catholic church, and established mission settlements along the St. Lawrence and in the Red River territory. He was active in furthering education, but insisted on maintaining the integrity of the French tongue in Lower Canada. In 1822 he opposed the union of Lower with Upper Canada in order to avoid the possibility of amalgamating the French and English. He took a great part in the discussions on the education law of 1824. Practical work in the same direction was not neglected. He educated many young men at his own expense, and the colleges of Nicolet and Ste. Hyacinthe were the outcome of his enthusiastic appeals. Ho died at Quebec on 4 Dec. 1825.

[Appleton's Cyclopædia of American Biography; Roger's History of Canada, vol. i.]

PLESYNGTON, SIR ROBERT DE (d. 1393), chief baron of the exchequer, was no doubt a member of the Lancashire family which derived its name from Pleasington, near Blackburn, and was perhaps a cousin of the first of that name, who owned Dimples in Garstang, Lancashire, where the family survived until the rebellion of 1715 (Chetham Soc. Publ. lxxxi. 01, xcv. 75, cv. 232). Sir Robert himself would appear to have acquired lands in Rutland, though he had charge of cortain proporty at Lancaster in the exchequer, and on 6 Dec. 1380 was appointed chief baron. He is mentioned as levying a fine in 1382-3 (Surrey Fines, Surrey Archæol. Soc.) In November 1383 he pleaded in parliament for confirmation of a pardon lately granted him (Rolls of Parliament, iii. 164 b). Dugdale, through an error, thought that Pleavagton was removed from thought that Plesyngton was removed from the bench on 27 June 1383, but this really took place on 5 Nov. 1386. The ostensible reasons for his removal were that he prevented the king from receiving certain fines for marriage, and refused to hear apprentices and others of the law, telling them they knew not what they said, and did more harm than good to their clients, so that pleaders did not dare appear before him against sheriff's escheators, &c., and the king lost many fines (Foss; Deputy-Keeper Publ. Rec. 9th Rep. p. 244). The true reason would, however, appear to be that he was closely attached to the party of Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester [q.v.], and had so incurred the king's enmity. In the parliament of 1387 Plesyngton was spokesman for the Duke of Gloucester and other lords appellant, but he was not restored to his office. He died on 27 Sept. 1898 (Chetham Soc. Publ. cv. 232). But nevertheless, on the fall of Gloucester in September 1397, Plesyngton was condemned for his support of the duke, and his property was declared forfeit; this sentence was reversed in the first parliament of Henry IV in 1399 (Rolls of Parliament, iii. 384, 425, 450). By his wife Agnes he had a son, Sir Robert de Plesyngton, who was twenty-four years of age in 1393, and represented Rutland in the parliament of January 1307 (Return of Members of Parliament, i. 252). This Robert had two sons, Henry and John; his male line became extinct in William, son of Henry. John de Plesyngton was ancestor in the temale line of the families of Flowers of Whitwell, Rutland, Stavely of Nottinghamshire, and Sapcott of Burleigh (Visitation of Rutland, pp. 29-30, Harleian Society).

[Foss's Judges of England, iv. 67-70; Bridge's Northamptonshire, ii. 505; Wright's History of Rutland, p. 29; Abram's History of Blackburn, p. 612; other authorities quoted.] C. L. K.

PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE, EDWARD (1818–1889), politician, second son of William Pleydell-Bouverie, third earl of Radnor, by his second wife, Anne Judith, third daughter of Sir Henry Paulet St. John Mildmay, bart., was born on 26 April 1818. Educated at Harrow and at Trinity College, Cambridge, whence he graduated M.A. in 1888, he was a précis writer to Lord Palmerston from January to June 1840. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple on 27 Jan. 1848, and in the following year he was returned to parliament in the liberal interest as member for Kilmarnock. That constituency he represented until 1874, when his candidature proved unsuccessful. He was a prominent figure in the House of Commons. From July 1850 to March 1852 he was under-secretary of state for the home department in Lord John Russell's administration, and from April 1853 to March 1855 he was chairman of committees, while Lord Aber-deen was prime minister. In March 1855, when Palmerston became premier, Pleydell-Bouverie was made vice-president of the board of trade, and in August was transferred to the presidency of the poor-law board. That position he held until 1858. In 1857 he waappointed one of the committee of the council on education. He was second church estate commissioner from August 1859 to November 1865, and from 1869 he was one of the ecclesiastical commissioners for England.

Though a staunch liberal, he belonged to the old whig school, and in his last parliament he often found himself unable to agree with the policy of the liberal prime minister. Mr. Gladstone. In 1872, when a charge of evasion of the law was made against Mr. Gladstone in connection with the appointment he made to the rectory of Ewelme, Bouverie expressed regret that the prime minister should amuse his leisure hours by driving coacheand-six through acts of parliament, and should take such curious views of the meaning of statutes' (HANSARD, 8 March 1872, p. 1711; see art. HARVEY, WILLIAM WIGAN).

When the Irish university bill was introduced, Bouverie finally broke with Mr. Gladstone (March 1873). He denounced the measure as miserably bad and scandalously inadequate to its professed object. He voted against the second reading on 10 March, when the government was defeated (ib. 11 March 1878, p. 1760). Subsequently, in letters addressed to the 'Times,' he continued his attacks on the measure and on its framers.

After his retirement from parliament he became in 1877 associated with the corporation of foreign bondholders, and was soon made its chairman. Under his guidance the debts of many countries were readjusted; and the corporation's scheme for dealing with the Turkish debt was confirmed by the sultan's iradé of January 1882. Bouverie was also director of the Great Western railway company and of the Peninsular and Oriental company. He addressed numerous letters to the 'Times' newspaper under the signature of 'E. P. B.' He died at 44 Wilton Crescent, London, on 16 Dec. 1889.

Anne, youngest daughter of General Robert Balfour of Balbirnie, Fifeshire, and had issue Walter (b. 5 July 1848), a captain in the 2nd Wiltshire rifle volunteers, Edward Oliver (b. 12 Dec. 1856), and three daughters.

Debrett's House of Commons, ed. Mair, 1873, p. 28; Times, 17 Dec. 1889.] G. U. B.

PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE, WILLIAM, third Earl of Radnor (1779-1869). [See

BOUVERIE. PLIMER,

ANDREW (1763-1837),miniature painter, was born at Bridgwater, Somerset, in 1763. He practised in London, residing until 1807 in Golden Square, and was an exhibitor at the Royal Academy from 1786 to 1810, and once more in 1810. Though he never obtained the vogue of his contemporaries Richard Cosway [q. v.] and Muria Cosway [q. v.], Plimer was well patronised, and his miniatures are of the finest quality, admirable both in drawing and colour. They are now much sought for by collectors, and command large prices. Plimor's best-known work is the beautiful group of the three daughters of Sir John Rushout, recently in the collection of Mr. Edward Joseph, and now (1895) the property of Mr. Frank Wood-roffe. It has been well engraved by 12. Stodart. His portraits of Sir John Sinclair [q. v.] and Colonel Kemeys-Tynte have also been engraved. Two portraits by him of the Right Hon. William Windham are in tho South Kensington Museum. Plimer died at Brighton on 29 Jan. 1837.

NATHANIDI PLIMER (1751-1822), elder brother of Andrew, born at Wellington, Somerset, also practised miniature-painting; but his work is inferior to that of his brother. He exhibited at the Royal Academy from 1787 to 1815, and died in 1822,

[Rodgrave's Dict. of Artists; Propert's Hist. of Ministure Painting; Geat. Mag. 1837, pt. i. p. 334, Royal Academy Catalogues.]
F. M. O'D.

PLOT, ROBERT (1640-1696), antiquary, was the only son of Robert Plot of Sutton Baron, afterwards known as Sutton Barne, in Borden, Kent, a property which had been acquired by his grandfather, the descendant of an old Kentish family. His mother was Robecca, daughter of Thomas Patenden or Pedenden of Borden. Robert Plot the older died at Sutton Barne on 20 April 1669, agod 68, and was buried in Borden church, where a mural monument, with a long Latin inscription, was erected by his son.

The antiquary, who was baptised at Borden on 18 Dec. 1640, was educated at the free school at Wye, and matriculated at Oxford

He married, on 1 Nov. 1842, Elizabeth from Magdalon Hall on 2 July 1658. Josiah Pullen [q. v.] was his college tutor. He graduated B.A. in 1661, M.A. in 1664, and B.O.L. and D.C.L. in 1671. About 1676 he left Magdalen Hall, and entered as a commoner at University College, where he was at the expense of placing the statue of King Alfred over the portal in High Street. Plot had already directed his attention to the systematic study of natural history and antiquities in 1670, when he issued, in a single sheet folio, 'Enquiries to be propounded . in my Travels through England and Walcs,' ranging his queries under seven heads: 'Heavens and Air,' Waters,' Earths,' Stones,' Metals,' Plants,' and Husbandry.' He seems at first to have had a design to anticipate Pennant, and recorded his intention of making a 'philosophical tour' throughout England and Wales in a letter to Dr. Fell, which is printed in the editions of Leland's 'Itinerary' subsequent to 1710. Finding it necessary to restrict his scheme, he ultimately published, in 1677, 'The Natural History of Oxfordshire. Being an Essay towards the Natural History of England, Oxford, 4to; licensed 1076, and dedicated to Charles II. The work, which is illustrated by a map and sixteen beautiful plates by Burghers, each with a separate dedication, is drawn up upon a plan which is thus described by the author: first, 'animals, plants, and the universal furniture of the world; secondly, nature's 'extravagancies and defects, occasioned either by the exuberancy of matter or obstinucy of impediments. as in monsters; and then, lastly, as she is rostrained, forced, fashioned, or determined by artificial operations.' A second edition, with additions, and an account of the author by his stepson, John Burman, appeared at Oxford in 1705, fol. When the Duke of York visited Oxford with the Princess Anne, in the spring of 1683, Plot's 'Natural History' was presented to him as a leaving gift, to-gether with Anthony à Wood's History and Antiquities of the University of Oxford." It was frequently quoted as an authority until the close of the eighteenth century, and in the accounts which he gave of rare plants, due regard being had to the time in which he wrote, 'Plot has not been excelled,' says Pultoney, 'by any subsequent writer.' As a consequence of the reputation made by his book, Plot was, in 1682, made secretary to the Royal Society, of which he had been elected fellow on 6 Dec. 1677, and edited the 'Philosophical Transactions' from No. 148 to No. 166 inclusive. In March 1688, when 'twelve cartloads of Tredeskyn's (Tradescant's) rarities came from London' to form the nucleus of Ashmole's museum, Plot was appointed London. She and her sister subsequently first custos, and in the following May he explained some of the exhibits, which he had in the meantime skilfully arranged, to the Duke of York. In the same year he was appointed professor of chemistry at Oxford, and the pressure of university duties compelled him to resign his secretaryship to the Royal Society in November 1684, William Musgrave [q. v.] being appointed in his stead. About the same time he published his 'De Origine Fontium tentamen philosophicum. In prelectione habita coram societate philosophica nuper Oxonii instituta ad scientiam naturalem promovendam,' Oxford (1684), 8vo. In 1684, too, Plot presented, to receive the degree of D.C.L. from Oxford University, one of his staunchest patrons, Henry Howard, seventh duke of Norfolk [q.v.] The latter, in his capacity of earl marshal, made Plot his secretary or 'rogister' in 1687. Meanwhile, Plot had, at the invitation of Walter Chetwynd of Ingestry, visited Staffordshire with a view of describing the 'natural, topical, political, and mechanical history' of that county. In 1686 he produced 'The Natural History of Staffordshire,' ()xford, 4to, which was dedicated to James II. The plates were again executed by Burghers. This work is more attractively written than its forerunner, while it gives ampler proof of Plot's credulity. For many years afterwards it was a boast among the Staffordshire squires, to whom he addressed his inquiries, how readily they had 'humbugged old Plot.' Dr. Johnson, however, was needlessly sceptical when he refused to believe Plot's account of a river flowing underground in Staffordshire. The book served to confirm Plot's reputation. Dr. Charlett wished him to undertake an edition of Pliny's 'Natural History.' He himself talked of producing a 'Natural History of London and Middlesex,' but he ultimately rested on his laurels. Plot was unsuccessful in an effort to obtain the wardenship of All Souls', but was consoled in 1688 by the office of historiographer-royal. In February 1695 a new post was created for him at the Heralds' Office as Mowbray herald extraordinary, and two days later, on 7 Feb., he was constituted registrar of the court of honour. About 1695 he retired to his property at Sutton Barne, which he greatly improved.

Plot died of the stone at Sutton Barne, on 30 April 1696, and was buried in Borden church, where his widow erected a monument with a Latin inscription. Plot married, on 21 Aug. 1690, Rebecca, widow of Henry Burman, and second daughter of Ralph Sherwood (1625-1705), citizen and grocer of Letter to the Earl of Arlington concerning erected a monument to their father in Borden church. Plot left two sons, Robert and Ralph Sherwood. The elder was improvident, wasted his patrimony, was reduced at one period to work as a labourer in Sheerness dockyard, and died in a state of dependence in March 1751.

Plot, who is said to have been a bon vivant, was a witty man and knew how to render his stores of learning attractive to a wide circle of readers. He shared the tory predilections of the two contemporary Oxford antiquaries, Anthony à Wood and Thomas Hearne. but, unlike them, he was by disposition a timeserver. His acquisitiveness was such as to disgust some of his fellow-antiquaries, and Edward Lhuyd [q. v.], Plot's assistant, and afterwards (1690) his successor as custos of the Ashmolean, credits him with as 'bad morals as ever 'characterised a master of arts (cf. however Nichols, Illustr. of Lit. ix. 547). He had some acquaintance with most of the learned men of his day, and was intimate both with Samuel Pepys and with John Evelyn. To the latter he applied in 1682 for some autobiographical notes on behalf of the author of the 'Athense Oxonienses.' portrait of Plot, which was formerly in the possession of the family, is now at All Souls' College. His portrait was also included in the view of Magdalen Hall engraved by Vertue for the 'Oxford Almanac' in 1749.

The following is a list of Plot's chief contributions to the 'Philosophical Transactions' of the Royal Society: 1. The Formation of Salt and Sand from Brine' (Phil. Trans. xiii. 96). 2. 'A Discourse of Sepulchral Lamps of the Ancients' (xiv. 806). 3. 'The History of the Weather at Oxford in 1684' (xv. 930). 4. 'Account of some Incombustible Cloth (ib. p. 1051). 5. Discourse concerning the most seasonable Time of felling Timber, written at the request of Samuel Pepys, Esq., Secretary of the Admiralty' (xvii, 455). This work is referred to more (xvii, 455). than once by Pepys in his letters. 6. 'Observations on the Substance called Black Lead' (xx. 183). 7. 'A Catalogue of Electrical Bodies' (ib. p. 384; MATY, General Index to Phil. Trans. 1787, p. 735).

A list of his writings in manuscript, drawn up shortly before his death, is printed by Wood (Athenæ Oxon., ed. Bliss. iv. 775). Of these, the following only appear to have been printed: 1. A Defence of the Jurisdiction of the Earl Marshall's Court in the Thetford,' printed in Hearne's 'Antiquities spiece to his 'Poems,' 1781. A portrait of of Glastonbury, 1722, p. 225. 3. 'An Account of some Antiquities in the County of Kent, 'printed in Nichols's 'Bibliotheca Topographica,' vol. i. A copy of Plot's 'History of Staffordshire' in the British Museum Library contains several manuscript notes by the author.

[Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Wood's Athene Oxon. ed. Bliss, iv. 772-9; Noblo's College of Arms, 1801, p. 326; Erdeswick's Survey of Staffordshire, 1844, p. liii; Hasted's Kent, ii. 565; Aubrey's Bodleian Letters, 1813, i. 74; Letters of Eminent Literary Men (Camdon Soc.); Pulteney's Progress of Botany, i. 351; Gent. Mag. 1795, ii. 897, 996, 1089; Nicholy's Lit. Anced. ix. 202, 408, 547, 775, 781, and Lit. Illustr. iii. 234, 644, iv. 224, 615, 654, vi. 668; Biogr. Brit.; Chalmers's Biogr. Dict.; Granger's Biogr. Hist. of England, iv. 85; Archæologia Cantiana, ix. 60 n.; Nicolson's Engl. Hist. Libr. 1776, p. 17; Wood's Life and Times (Oxford Hist. Soc.), vols. i. ii. and iii. passim; Hearne's Collections, ed. Doble (Oxf. Hist. Soc.), vols. i. ii. and iii. passim; Notes and Queries, 6th ser. i. 230, 292; Wheatley and Cunningham's London, ii. 406; Thomson's Hist. of the Royal Soc. App.; Evolyn's Diary, 1852 ii. 99, 164, iii. 261, 321, 335; Chambers's Book of Days, i. 553; Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Hill, iii. 94; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Bodleian Libr. Cat.; Brit. Mus. Ont.]

PLOTT, JOHN (1782-1803), miniaturepainter, was born at Winchester in 1732. In early life he was employed by an attorney, and in 1756 acted as clerk of the accounts for the maintenance of French prisoners quartered near Winchester. He then turned to art, and, after receiving some instruction in landscape from Richard Wilson, became a pupil of Nathaniel Hone, whom he assisted in his miniatures and enamels. Plott practised miniature-painting with success both in London and Winchester, exhibiting with the Incorporated Society from 1764 to 1775, and at the Royal Academy from 1772 to the end of his life. Having a taste for natural history, he also executed a number of beautiful water-colour drawings of that kind, including a series for a projected work on 'Land Snails,' which remained unfinished at Late in life Plott became a his death. member of the corporation of Winchester, and he died there on 27 Oct. 1803. He was an intimate friend of George Keate [q. v.], and some of their correspondence is now in the possession of Mr. G. B. Henderson of Bloomsbury Place; it appears from one of the letters that Plott was twice a candidate for a librarianship in the British Museum. Plott painted a miniature of Keate, which was engraved by J. K. Sherwin as a frontil'lott, scraped in mezzotint by himself, is mentioned by Bromley (Cat. of Engraved Portraits) and in the Musgrave catalogue, but is not otherwise known.

[Edwards's Anecdotes of Painting; Graves's Diet. of Artists, 1760-1880; Chaloner Smith's British Mezzotinto Portraits; information from G. B. Monderson, csq.] F. M. O'D.

PLOUGH, JOHN (d. 1562), protestant controversialist, son of Christopher Plough of Nottingham, and nephew of John Plough. rector of St. Peter's, in the same town was born there and educated at Oxford, where he supplicated for his B.C.L. in 1548-4. In the same year he became vicar of Sarratt, Hertfordshire, and subsequently succeeded his uncle as rector of St. Peter's, Nottingham. During Edward VI's reign he made himself prominent as a reformer, and on Mary's accession fled to Basle, where he remained throughout the reign. While there he engaged in controversy with William Kethe [q.v.] and Robert Crowley [q.v.], two of the exiles at Frankfort. About 1559 he returned to England, presented a declaration of protestant doctrines to Elizabeth, and was presented by his fellow-exile, Grindal, to the rectory of East Ham, Essex, in 1560. In the same year he was granted the living of Long Bredy, Dorset, by letters patent. He died before November 1562.

Wood ascribes to Plough several works which he had never seen, and none are now known to be extant. The titles are: 1. 'An Apology for the Protestants,' written in reply to 'The Displaying of the Protestants,' by Miles Huggardo [q.v.] It was composed and published at Basle, and Strype gives the date as 1558. 2. 'A Treatise against the Mitred Men in the Popish Kingdom.' 3. 'The Sound of the Doleful Trumpot.'

[Wood's Athenæ Oxon. i. 301-2; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Lensd. MS. 980, f. 265; Strype's Eccl. Mem. III. i. 232, 442; Rymer's Feedera, xv. 585; Nowcourt's Repertorium, ii. 302; Whittingham's Brioff Discours of the Troubles at Frankford; Brown's Nottinghamshire Worthies.]

PLOWDEN, CHARLES (1743-1821), rector of Stonyhurst college, seventh son of William Ignatius Plowden, esq., of Plowden Hall, Shropshire, by his wife, Frances Dormer, daughter of Charles, fifth baron Dormer, of Wenge, was born at Plowden Hall on 1 May or 10 Aug. 1743. His brother, Francis Peter Plowden, is separately noticed. At the age of ten he was sent to a school at Edgbaston, and on 7 July 1754 was transferred to the college of the English jesuits at St. Omer. Upon the conclusion of his humanity studies he entered the Society of Jesus at Watten on 7 Sept. 1759; and, after completing his theology at Bologna, he was ordained priest at Rome on 30 Sept. 1770. At the time of the suppression of the jesuit order in 1773 he was minister at the English College, Bruges, or the 'Great College,' as it was called, to distinguish it from the preparatory college in the same city. Upon the violent destruction of the Bruges colleges by the imperial government in 1773, Plowden was detained prisoner, with other ecclesiastics, for several months. On regaining his liberty, he joined the English academy established at Liège by the fathers of the old society.

tailed prisoner, with other ecclesiastics, for seweral months. On regaining his liberty, he joined the English academy established at Liège by the fathers of the old society. In 1784 he became chaplain and tutor to the family of Mr. Weld at Lulworth Castle, Dorset, and in November 1794 he resided his forcest called war at Standard. joined his former colleagues at Stonyhurst, three months after their migration from Liège. In 1796 he acted as chaplain to the convent at York. Upon the first restoration of the English province of the Society of Jesus, vivæ vocis oraculo, in 1803, a novitiate was opened at Hodder Place, near Stonyhurst, and Plowden was appointed master of novices, and there wrote a series of exhortations to novices which has always been held in the highest esteem. He was professed of the four vows on 15 Nov. 1805. After the bull of restoration issued by Pius VII, Plowden was declared provincial on 8 Sept. 1817, and at the same time rector of Stonyhurst college. In 1820 he was summoned to Rome for the election of a new general of the society, and on his return through France he died suddenly, at Jougne in Franche-Comté, on 13 June 1821. In consequence of some misunderstanding, he was buried, with military honours, as a general, in the parish cemetery.

He was a writer of great power, and Foley remarks that 'the English Province can boast of but few members more remarkable for talent, learning, prudence, and every religious virtue.' Richard Lalor Sheil [q.v.], who had been his pupil, declares that Plowden 'had every title to be considered an orator of the first class,' and says: 'He was a perfect Jesuit of the old school; his mind was stored with classical knowledge; his manners were highly polished; he had great eloquence, which was alternately vehement and persuasive, as the occasion put his talents into requisition; and with his various accomplishments he combined the loftiest enthusiasm for the advancement of roligion' ('Schoolboy Recollections' in New Monthly Mag. August 1829).

His works are: 1. 'Considerations on the VOL. XV.

modern opinion of the Fallibility of the Holy See in the Decision of Dogmatical Questions, with an Appendix on the Appointment of Bishops, London, 1790, 8vo. 2. 'A Discourse delivered at the Consecration of Dr. John Douglass, Bishop of Centuria, at Lullworth, London, 1791, 8vo. 3. 'An Answer to the second Blue Book, containing a Refutation of the Principles, Charges, and Arguments, advanced by the Catholic Committee against their Bishops,' London, 1791, 8vo. 4. Observations on the Oath proposed to the English Roman Catholics,' London, 1791, 8vo. 5. 'Letter to the Staffordshire Clergy,' 1792. 6. 'Remarks on the Writings of the Reverend Joseph Berington, addressed to the Catholic Clergy of England,' London, 1792, 8vo. 7. 'Remarks on a book entitled Memoirs of Gregorio Panzani, preceded by an Address to the Rev. Joseph Berington,' Liège, 1794, 8vo, pp. 383. 8. 'A Letter
... to C. Butler, W. Cruise, H. Clifford, and W. Throckmorton ... Reporters of the Cisalpine Club. In which their Reports on the Instrument of Catholic Protestation lodged in the British Museum are examined, 9. 'The Letters of London, 1796, 8vo. Clericus to Laicus.' They appeared originally in the 'Pilot' newspaper in reply to the diatribes of one Blair, an apothecary, who assumed the style of 'Laicus.' Plowden's letters were reprinted by R. C. Dallas in his 'New Conspiracy against the Jesuits detected and briefly exposed,' London, 1815, 8vo. 10. 'The Case is altered,' in a letter addressed to the catholics of Wigan, 1818, 8vo. 11. 'Account of the Preservation and Actual State of the Society of Jesus in the Russian Empire Dominions, 1783-4. Published in 'Dolman's Magazine, 1846-7. Inserted in 'Letters and Notices,' Roehampton, 1869, 8vo, pp. 131-43, 279-92. There remain in manuscript at Stonyhurst 'Narrative of the Destruction of the English Colleges at Bruges, with an account of Plowden's imprisonment from 20 Sept. 1773 to 25 May 1774, and his 'Instructions to Novices.' Many of his letters and papers are preserved in the archives of the English province.

[Amherst's Hist. of Catholic Emancipation, i. 168, 176, 197, 201-4; Biogr. Dict. of Living Authors, 1816, p. 276; Caballero's Bibl. Script. Soc. Jesu, i. 227; Catholic Advocate, 15 July 1821, p. 264; Catholic Progress, 1880, ix. 195; Coleridge's St. Mary's Convent, York, p. 254; De Backer's Bibl. de la Compagnie de Jésus; Foley's Records, iv. 555, vii 601; Gerard's Stonyhurst, pp. 37, 114, 123; Gillow's Bibl. Dict. i. 567; MacNevin's Memoir of Shiel, 1845, p. xix; Oliver's Cornwall, p. 382; Oliver's Jesuita, p. 166; Panzani's Memoirs, pref. p. xxxi.] T. C.

F b

PLOWDEN, EDMUND (1518-1585), jurist, born at Plowden, Shropshire, in 1518, was the eldest son of Humphrey Plowden, esq., of that place, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter of John Sturry, esq., of Ross Hall in the same county, and relict of William Wollascot, esq. He spent three years in the university of Cambridge, which he left without a degree; and in 1538 he entered the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar (Coorus, Athena Cantabr. i. 501). According to tradition, he was so excessively studious that for the space of three years he did not leave the Temple once. Before 1550 he resorted to the courts at Westminster and elsewhere, and took notes of the cases there argued and decided. Wood asserts that, after studying at Cambridge and in the Temple, Plowden spont four years at Oxford, and in November 1552 was admitted to practice chirurgery and physic by the convocation of that university (Athena Ovon. ed Bliss, i. 503). He was one of the council of the marches of Wales in the first year of the reign of Queen Mary. In the parliament which began 5 Oct. 1553 he sat for Wallingford, Borkshire; and in July 1551 he was acting as one of the justices of gaol delivery for the county of Salop at the session held at Shrewsbury, at which were decided several important crown cases from divers counties of Wales. In the parliament which assembled 12 Nov. 155t he appears to have been returned both for Reading, Berkshire, and for Wootton-Bassett, Wiltshire. From 12 Jan. 1554-5 he, with other members, to the number of thirty-nine, who were dissatisfied with the proceedings of parliament, withdrew from the House of Commons. Informations for contempt were filed against them by the attorney-general. Six submitted; but Plowdon 'took a traverse full of pregnancy.' The matter was never decided. To the parliament which met on 21 Oct. 1555 Plowden was returned for Wootton-Bassett. He was autumn reader of the Middle Temple in 1557, and at one period he was reader at New Inn. On the death of his father, 21 March 1557-8, he succeeded to the estate at Plowden.

On 27 Oct. 1558 a writ was directed to him calling upon him to take upon himself the degree of serjeant-at-law in Easter term following. Before the return of this writ, however, Queen Mary died, whereby it abated. It was not renowed by Queen Elizabeth. Ho was double Lent reader of the Middle Temple in 1500-1. On 20 June 1601 he was appointed treasurer of his inn, and during the time he held that office the crection of the noble hall of the Middle Temple was begun. In Michaelmas term 1562 he was acting as one of the counsel of the court of the duchy of Lan-

His reputation as a lawyer was now very great. As, however, he steadily adhered to the Roman catholic religion, he was regarded with suspicion by the privy council, although they refrained from proceeding against him, It is said that a letter from Queen Elizabeth. offering the office of lord chancellor to Plowden upon condition of his renouncing the catholic faith, was preserved among the family papers at Plowden until the beginning of the present century, when it was unfortunately lost (Folix, Records, iv. 538). His reply was a dignified refusal (ib. p. 539). Plowden was frequently employed in opposing the established authorities. He defended Bonner against Bishop Horne, and his bold advocacy of Bonner's case was completely successful (Cooper, Athenæ Cantabr. On 16 Oct. 1566 he appeared at the bar of the House of Commons as counsel for (tabriel Goodman [q. v.], dean of Westminster, in opposition to a bill for abolishing sanctuaries for debt. In this instance, too, his exertions proved effectual: the bill was rejected on 4 Dec. by 75 votes against 60. On 17 Nov. 1569 the sheriff and magistrates of Berkshire assembled at Abingdon in order to procure subscriptions for observance of uniformity of divine service. All present signed the report except Plowden. who was described as of Shiplake. He was therefore required to give a bond to be of good behaviour for a year, and to appear before the privy council when summoned (Nute Papers, Dom. Eliz. vol. lx. Nos. 47 and 47 [2]). In a list, duted 1578, of certain papists in London there appeared the name of Mr. Ployden, who hears mass at Baron Brown's, Fish Street Hill.' On 2 Dec. 1580 articles were exhibited to the privy council against him upon matters of religion. The first was that 'he came to church until the bull came in that [John] Felton [q. v.] was executed for [in 1570], and the northern rebels rose up, and after that he hath utterly refused both service and sacrament, and every other means to communicate with the church.' In consequence of his action the Middle Temple, it was said, was 'postored with papists.' He died on 6 Feb. 1584-5, and was buried in the Temple church, where there is a monument to his memory, with his figure in a lawyer's robe, and a Latin inscription.

He married Catharine, daughter of William Sheldon, esq., of Beoley, Worcestershire, and by her had issue: Edmund, who died in 1586; Francis, who lived till 11 Dec. 1652; and Mary, who became the wife of Richard White, esq., by whom she had issue Thomas White [q. v.], principal of the English College at Lisbon.

In addition to his paternal inheritance he left estates at Burghfield, Shiplake, and other places in Berkshire and Oxfordshire. These latter estates seem to have been acquired by his professional gains.

His name was embodied in the proverb, 'The case is altered, quoth Plowden,' which has occasioned some speculation as to its The most probable explanation is origin. that Plowden was engaged in defending a gentleman who was prosecuted for hearing mass, and elicited the fact that the service had been performed by a layman, who had merely assumed the sacerdotal character and vestments for the purpose of informing against those who were present. Thereupon the acute lawyer remarked, 'The case is altered: no priest, no mass,' and succeeded in obtaining the acquittal of his client. By his contemporaries he was acknowledged to be the greatest and most honest lawyer of his age. Camden says that, 'as he was singularly well learned in the common laws of England, whereof he deserved well by writing, so for integrity of life he was second to no man of his profession' (Annales, transl. by R. N., 1635, p. 270). He was regarded with great admiration by Sir Edward Coke, who remarks, in terminating the fourth part of his 'Institutes:' 'We will conclude with the aphorism of that great lawyer and sage of the law, Edmund Plowden, which we have often heard him say, "Blessed be the amending hand."' les reportes de Edmunde Plowden, un apprentice de la comen ley, de dyvers cases esteantes matters en ley, et de les argumentes sur yceaux, en les temps des raygnes les roye Edwarde le size, le roigne Mary, le roy et roigne Phillipp et Mary, et le roigne Elizabeth, London, 1571, fol. Reprinted Ovesque un Table des Choses notables, compose per William Fleetwoods, Recorder de Loundres, & iammes cy devaunt imprime, 1578. The latter edition contains the second part, which is thus headed: 'Cy ensuont certeyne Cases Reportes per Edmunde Plowden, puis le primier imprimier de ses Commentaries, & ore a le second imprimpter de les dits Commentaries a ceo addes, 1579. Both parts were reprinted, London, 1590, 1613, 1684, fol., and they were translated into English, with useful references and notes [by Mr. Bromley, barrister-at-law], London, 1779, fol.; 2 vols. 1816, 8vo. An epitome of the reports appeared with the following title: Abridgement de toutes les Cases Reportes a large per T[homas] A[she], London, 1607, 12mo; translated into English by F[abian] H[icks] of the Inner Temple, London, 1650, 1659, 12mo. Sir Edward Coke, Daines Barrington, and Lord Campbell concur in extolling the ments of Plowden as a reporter. 2. 'Les Quæres del Monsieur Plowden,' London, n.d. 8vo; translated into English by H. B., London, 1662, 8vo; 1761, fol. The Queries' are included in some editions of the 'Reports.' 3. 'A Treatise of Succession written in the lifetime of the most virtuous and renowned Lady Mary, late Queen of Wherein is sufficiently proved that Scots. neither her foreign birth, nor the last will and testament of King Henry VIII could debar her from her true and lawful title to the Crown of England,' manuscript of 160 pages preserved at Pensax Court, Worcestershire. It is referred to by Sir Matthew Hale (Hist. of the Pleas of the Crown, 1786, i. 324). The dedication to James I is signed by Francis Plowden. 4. Several legal opinions and arguments preserved in manuscript in the Cambridge University Library (Gg. iv. 14, art. 3), and among the Hargrave collection in the British Museum.
His works are: 1. 'Les comentaries, ou

His portrait has been engraved by T. Stagner, and his monument by J. T. Smith.

[Addit. MS. 5878, f. 117; Ames's Typogr. Antiq. (Herbert), pp. 819, 822, 1132; Biogr. Brit. (Kippis), v. 197n.; Campbell's Chancellors, 4th edit. ii. 344; Cal. of Chancery Proceedings, tamp. Eliz. ii. 339; Collectanea Juridica, ii. 51; Dodd's Church Hist. i. 532; Foley's Records, iv. 168, 538, 546, 641; Foss's Judges of England, v. 347, 350, 425, 434; Fuller's Worthies (Shropshire): Granger's Biogr. Hist. of Eugland; Haynes's State Papers, 197 vel. 193; Leigh's Treatise of Religion and Learning, p. 294; Murdin's State Papers, pp. 29, 113, 122, 123; Notes and Queries, 1st ser. ix 56, 113, 2nd ser. i. 12, 3rd ser. x. 353 xi. 184; Oliv n's Jesuit Collections, pp. 166, 163; Simpson's Life of Campion, p. 307; Cal. State Papers, Dom. Eliz. 1647–80, pp. 307; Cal. State Papers, Strype's Works (gen. index); Tanner's Bibl. Brit.; Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, vol. int. pt. ii. pp. 26, 40, 45, 52.]

PLOWDEN, FRANCIS PETER (1749-1829), writer, brother of Charles Plowden [q. v.], and eighth son of William Ignatius Plowden, of Plowden, Shropshire, was born at Plowden on 28 June 1749, and received his education in the college of the English jesuits at St. Omer. Ha entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Watten on 7 Sept. 1763, and was master of the college at Bruges from 1771 to 1778. When the bull suppressing the Society of Jesus came into force, he, not having taken holy orders, found himself released from his first or simple vows of religion, and he returned to a secular life in 1778. He entered the Middle Temple, and for some years practised with success as a conveyancer. In consequence of the publication of his 'Jura Anglorum,' the university of Oxford conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L. at the Encomia on 5 July 1793 (FOSTER, Alumni Oxon. modern ser. iii. 1122). On the title-page of one of his works published in 1794, he desoribed himself as 'LL.D., of Gray's Inn, conveyancer.' The disabilities which prevented Roman catholics from pleading having boon removed, he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1706, and would have acquired considerable practice in the chancery courts had he not been retarded by a misunderstanding with the lord chancellor. He became eminent, however, as a legal and political writer, and published several pamphlets against Mr. Pitt. His 'Historical Review of the State of Ireland' (1808) was apparently written under the patronage of the government; but, as it failed to answer their views, he attacked the ministry in a preliminary preface. In 1813 a prosecution was instituted against him at the Lifford assizes by a Mr. Hart, who was connected with the government, for a libel contained in his 'History of Ireland.' A verdict was returned for the plaintiff, with 5,000% damages, and to avoid payment of this sum Plowden fled to France. and settled in Paris, where he was appointed a professor in the Scots College. He died in his apartments in the Rue Vaugirard on 4 Jan. 1829.

He married Dorothoa, daughter of Goorgo J. Griffith Phillips, esq., of Curacqwillinag, Carmarthenshire. This lady, who died at the residence of her son-in-law, the Earl of Dundonald, at Hammersmith, in July 1827, was the authoress of 'Virginia' (printed in 1800), a comic opera which was performed at Drury Lane, and condemned the first night (Baker, Riegr. Dram. 1812, i. 575, iii. 384). Their eldest son, Captain Plowden, was shot in a duel in Jamaica, where he was aidede-camp to General Churchill. The eldest daughter, Anna Maria, became the third countess of Archibald, ninth earl of Dundonald, in April 1819, and died on 18 Sept. 1822; and Mary, the youngest daughter, was married, on 2 Feb. 1800, to John Morrough, esg., of Oork.

esq., of Oork.

Plowden was a man of acknowledged talent, but in his worldly affairs he was somewhat improvident. In politics he was a staunch whig, and was strongly opposed to Pitt's policy. His portrait has been engraved by Bond from a painting by Woodforde.

His greatest work is: 1. 'An Historical Review of the State of Ireland, from the Invasion of that Country under Henry II to its Union with Great Britain, 1 Jan. 1801, 2 vols., London, 1808, 4to. Elaborate Strictures in support of the British government by Sir Richard Musgrave appeared in the 'British Critic, and were published separately. In roply, Plowden published: 'A Postliminious Preface to the Historical Roview of the State of Ireland, containing a Statement of the Author's Communications with the Right Hon. Henry Addington, &c., upon the subject of that work, London, 1804, 4to; 2nd edit., Dublin, 1804, 8vo. Subsequently Plowden wrote 'An Historical Letter to Sir Richard Musgrave, Bart., London, 1805, 8vo, and in 1809 he issued an enlarged edition of his original work in two volumes. In 1811 appeared a continuation of 'The History of Ireland from its Union with Great Britain in January 1801 to October 1810,' 3 vols., Dublin, 1811, 8vo.

His other works, bosides legal tracts, including five (1783-6) on the 'Case of the Earl of Newburgh,' are: 1. 'Impartial Thoughts upon the beneficial Consequences of Enrolling all Doeds, Wills, and Codicils affecting Lands throughout England and Wales, including a draught of a Bill proposed to be brought into Parliament for that purpose, London, 1789, 8vo. 2. The Case stated; occasioned by the Act of Parliament lately passed for the Relief of the English Roman Catholics, London, 1791, 8vo. 3. Jura Anglorum. The Rights of Englishmen; being an historical and legal Defence of the present Constitution,' London, 1792, 8vo, reprinted at Dublin the same year. This was attacked in 'A Letter... by a Roman Catholic Clergy-man, 1791. 4. 'A Short History of the British Empire during the last twenty months, viz. from May 1792 to the close of the year 1793,' London, 1794, 8vo; also Philadelphia, 1704, 8vo. 5. 'A Friendly and Constitutional Address to the People of Great Britain,' London, 1794, 8vo. In the same year John Reeves printed 'The Malcontents: a Letter to Francis Plowden,' and there was also 'A Letter from an Associator to Francis Plowdon.' 6. 'Church and State; being an Enquiry into the Origin, Nature, and Extent of Ecclesiastical and Civil Authority, with reference to the British Constitution, London, 1795, 4to. 7. 'A Short History of the British Empire during the year 1794,' London, 1795, Svo. 8. 'A Treatise upon the Law of Usury and Annuities,' London, 1796, 1797, 8vo. 9. 'The Constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Civil and Reclesiastical, London, 1802, 8vo. 10. The Principles and Law of Tithing illustrated, 1806, 8vo. 11. 'An Historical Letter to C. O'Conor, D.D., heretofore styling himself Columbanus, upon his five Addresses or Letters to his Countrymen,' Dublin, 1812, 8vo. 12. 'A Second Historical Letter to Sir J. C. Hippisley . . . upon his public conduct in the Catholic Oause...Occasioned by his Animadversions upon the Author in the House of Commons in 1814,' Paris, 1815, 8vo. 13. 'A Disquisition concerning the Law of Alienage and Naturalisation, according to the Statutes in force between the 10th of June 1818 and the 25th of March 1819 . . . illustrated in an elaborate opinion of counsel upon the claim of Prince Giustiani to the Earldom of Newburgh,' Paris, 1818, 8vo. 14. 'Human Subornation; being an elementary Disquisition concerning the civil and spiritual Power and Authority to which the Creator requires the submission of every human being. Illustrated by references to occurrences in the agitation of . . . Catholic Emancipation,' London, 1824, 8vo.

He was not the compiler of a disreputable work attributed to him, entitled 'Crim. Con. Biography,' 2 vols., London, 1880, 12mo.

[Biogr. Dict. of Living Authors, 1816. Evaus's Cat. of Engraved Portraits, n. 20387-9; Foley's Records, 1v. 560, vii. 603; Gent. Mag. 1829, i. 374; Georgiau Era, ii. 547; Martin's Privately Printed Books, 2nd edit p. 200; Monthly Review, new ser. xiv. 261; Watt's Bibl. Brit. T. C.

PLOWDEN, WALTER CHICHELE (1820-1860), consul in Abyssinia, youngest son of Trevor Chichele Plowden of the Bengal civil service, was born on 8 Aug. 1820, and educated at Dr. Evan's school, Hampstead. At the age of nineteen he entered the office of Messrs. Carr, Tagore, & Co., in Calcutta; but sedentary life was so uncongenial to him that he resigned in 1843, and embarked for England. At Suez he met Mr. J. T. Bell, and joined him in an expedition into Abyssinia to discover the sources of the White Nile. He remained in that country till 1847, and was shipwrecked in the Red Sea, on his way to England. In 1848 he was appointed consul in Abyssinia, with a mission to Ras Alı. He remained in the interior till February 1860, when he took leave of King Theodore. Near Gondar, on the Kaka river, he was attacked by a rebel chieftain, and was wounded and taken prisoner. He was ransomed by the authorities of Gondar on 4 March, and carried into the town, where he died of his injuries on 13 March 1860.

Ilis manuscripts were forwarded to his brother, Trevor Chichele Plowden, by whom they were published as 'Travels in Abyssinia and the Galla Country,' 8vo, London, 1868.

[Preface to the Travels, and information kindly supplied by Mr. Trevor C. Plowden.]

PLUGENET, ALAN DE (d. 1299), baron, was son of Alan de Plugenet, by Alicia, sister of Robert Walerand (d. 1278); another account makes him son of Andrew de la Bere (G. E. C[OKAYNE], Complete Peerage, vi. 254). His family was settled at Preston Pluchenet in Somerset. He fought on the king's side in the barons' war, and was rewarded in 1265 with the manor of Haselberg, Northamptonshire, from the lands of William Marshall (BLAAUW, Barons' War, p. 300 n.; Deputy-Keeper Publ. Rec. 49th Rep. p. 137; Madox, Hist. Exchequer). In 1267 his uncle Robert Walerand, whose brother's sons, Robert and John Walerand, were both idiots, granted him the reversion of Kilpeck Castle, Hereford, with other lands in Somerset, Dorset, and Wiltshire, for a yearly payment of 140l. and a sparrow-hawk (HOARE, Hist. of Wiltshire, Cawden, p. 25). Walerand had also granted Plugenet his estate at Haselberg, Somerset, for the yearly rent of one rosebud (Feet of Fines, p. 55, Somerset Record Soc.) Plugenet and his son had custody of the Walerand estates till the death of John Walerand in 1809, when Plugenet's son Alan was found the true heir (Liber de Antiquis Legibus, pp.lvvi-ii, Camd. Soc.; Cal. Patent Rolls, Edward I, 1281-92, pp. 12, 117, 162). Plugenet was governor of Dunster Castle in 1271. In 1282 he served in the Welsh war. In June 1287 he was sent to Wales, and continued there two years (ib. p. 271). By his oppressive conduct as king's steward he is alleged to have provoked the rising under Rhys ap Meredith in 1287, when Droselan Castle was captured by Edmund, earl of Lancaster (Annales Monastici, iii. 338; cf. Flores Historiarum, iii. 66). Plugenet was, however, entrusted with the duty of repairing the castle, and on the completion of the work was made its constable (Cal. Pat. Rolls, Edw. I, 1281-92, pp. 289, 293, 301, 320). On 24 Jan. 1292 he was present with the king at Westminster, and on 18 Aug. of that year was employed on a commission of gaol delivery at Exeter (ib. pp. 469, 520). In 1294 he was summoned for the war of Gascony, and in 1297 was one of the council for the young Prince of Wales during the king's absence in Flanders (RISHANGER, Chron. p. 179, Rolls Ser.) He died in 1290, having been summoned to parliament as a baron from 1292 to 1297. Rishanger (u.s.) describes him as a knight of tried discretion.

a daughter Joan.

ALAN DE l'EUGENET (1277-1319) served in Scotland in 1300, 1301, and 1303, and was knighted at the same time as the Prince of Wales, at Whitsuntide 1306. He again served in the Scottish wars from 1309 to 1311, from 1313 to 1317, and in 1319; he was summoned to parliament as a baron in 1311 (Palgravn, Parliamentary Writs, iv. 1299). In June 1315 his mother died, having directed that she should be buried at Sherborne. John de Drokensford [q. v.], the bishop, ordered Plugenet to comply with her wishes. Plugenet made the bishop's messenger out the letter and wax, and for this outrage was summoned to Wells. He denied the charge, but admitted that he had the messenger so soundly beaten that in his terror he ale the letter without compulsion (Drokunsford, Register, pp. 88-9, Somerset Record Soc.) Plugenet died in 1819, and was buried at Dore Abboy; his tomb was inscribed:

Ultimus Alanus de Plukenet hie tumulatur ; Nobilis urbanus vermibus esca datur.

He left no issue by his wife Sybil, who in 1827 married Henry do Pembridge, and died in 1353 (Cal. Patent Rolls, Edward III, 1327-30, p. 169; Cal. Inq. post mortem, ii. 181). His sister, Joan de Bolun, was his heiress; she died in 1327, when her lands passed to Richard, son of Richard de la Bore, who was brother of the whole blood to her father (HOARE, Hist. Wiltshire, u.s.)

[Authorities quoted; Kirby's Quest for Somerset, pp. 2-5, 9, 25 (Somerset Record Society); Registrum Malmesburiense, ii. 246-8, Rolls Ser.; Dugdale's Monasticon Anglicanum, v. 554; Dugdale's Baronage, ii. 2-3; Lowis's History of Kilpeck; Battle Abbey Roll, iii. 21; Cal. Patent Rolls, 1202-1301, passim; Robinson's U. L. K. Castles of Herefordshire.]

PLUKENET, LEONARD (1642-1706), botanist, son of Robert Plukenot, and his wife Elizabeth, was born on 4 Jan. 1642. In early life he was a fellow-student of William Courten [q. v.] and of Robert Uvedale [q. v.], Pultency suggests at Cambridge, but his name does not appear in the matriculation lists. Jackson (Journ. Bot. 1804, p. 248) believes, however, that it was at Westminster School under Dr. Busby. He soon practised as a physician in London, having apparently taken his M.J). degree abroad, and resided at St. Margaret's Lane, Old Palace Yard, Wostminster, where he had a small botanic garden. He also had access to the gardens of other botanists, and owned a farm at Horn Hill, Hertfordshire. He published many works on botany at his

By his wife Joan he had a son Alan and own expense, and after 1089 his labours apparently attracted the interest of Queen Mary, who appointed him superintendent of the royal gardens at Hampton Court with the title of Royal Professor of Botany, or ' Queen's Botanist.'

He died at Westminster on 6 July 1706. and was interred on the 12th in the chancel of St. Margaret's Church. According to the registers of St. Margaret's, his wife Letitia bore him thirteen children; Pulteney speaks of another son, Richard, who was a student at Cambridge in 1696 (cf. Journ. Bot. 1894,

p. 248).

Plukenet's long series of volumes forms a continuous description of plants of all parts of the world. They contain 2,740 figures with descriptive letterpress. Though chiefly devoted to exotics, several British plants were first figured in his plates. To Plukenet John Ray [q. v.] was indebted for assistance in the arrangement of the second volume of his 'Historia Plantarum.' His labours were ill approciated by his fellow-botanists, and in his later writings Plukenet evinces his sense of neglect by passing severe though not unjust strictures on Sir Hans Sloane and James Petiver [q. v.]

His ' Phytographia,' &c., 4 pts. 4to, London, 1691-2, delineates new and rare species of plants. Subsequent works catalogue the contents of his herbarium, which comprised eight thousand plants. Their titles are: 'Almagestum Botanicum,'&c., 8vo, London, 1696; 'Almagesti Botanici Mantissa,'&c., 4to, London, 1700; 'Amalthoum Botanicum, &c., with an index to the whole series, 4to, London, 1705. A collected edition of all these works, in six volumes, made up out of the surplus copies, was issued in 1720 and reprinted in 1709; an 'Index Linneanus' identifying his figures with Linué's species, was published by Gisoke in 1779.

Plukenot's herbarium forms part of the Sloane collection kept in the Botanical Department of the British Museum (Natural History), where some of Plukenet's manuscript is also preserved.

A portrait engraved by Collins appears in the 'Phytographia.'

[Pultoney's Skatches, ii. 18-20; Rees's Cyclopadia; Journ. Bot. 1882 pp. 338-42, 1894 pp. 247-8; Trimon and Dyer's Flora of Middlesex, p. 374.]

PLUMER, SIR THOMAS (1753-1824), master of the rolls, born on 10 Oct. 1753. was the eldest son of Thomas Plumer, of Lilling Hall, in the parish of Sheriff-Hutton in the North Riding of Yorkshire, some time a wine merchant in London, by his wife

Anne, daughter of John Thompson of Kirby, Lord Melville on his impeachment by Yorkshire. He was educated at Eton and the House of Commons, obtaining an ac-University College, Oxford, where he matri-culated on 10 June 1771. While at the university he acquired the reputation of being one of the best scholars among the undergraduates' (MAURICE, Memoirs of the Author of Indian Antiquities, 1819-22, pt. ii. p. 25). He graduated B.A. in 1775, M.A. in 1778, and B.C.L. in 1783, was elected Vinerian scholar in 1777, and in June 1780 became a fellow of his college. Plumer entered Lincoln's Inn on 6 April 1769, and was ad- | land's administration in the spring of 1807, mitted to chambers in No. 23 Old Buildings in July 1775. While pursuing his legal studies Plumer attended Sir James Eyre [q. v.] on his circuits, and frequently assisted him by taking down the evidence at the trials over which he presided. Having been called to the bar on 7 Feb. 1778, Plumer joined the Oxford and South Wales circuits, and in 1781 was appointed one of the commissioners of bankrupts.

In 1785 he was employed in the defence of Sir Thomas Rumbold [q. v.] at the bar of the House of Commons. The ability which he showed on this occasion led to his being retained in 1787 as one of the three counsel to defend Warren Hastings, his coadjutors being Edward Law (afterwards Baron Ellenborough, lord chief justice of England) and Robert Dallas (afterwards lord chief justice of the common pleas). On 23 Feb. 1792, and the four succeeding court days, Plumer made an elaborate and lucid speech in defence of Hastings with reference to the first article of the impeachment (Bonn, Speeches of the Managers and Counsel in the Trial of Warren Hastings, 1860, vol. ii. pp. xliv, 085-916), and on 25 April 1793 he commenced his summing up of the evidence given on the part of the defendant on the second article, which occupied four days (ib. vol. iii. pp. xx, 295-496). Plumer was appointed a king's counsel on 7 Feb. 1793 (London Gazette, 1793, p. 107), and was elected a hencher of Lincoln's Inn in the Easter term following. In May 1796 he defonded John Reeves, charged with publishing a seditions libel (Howell, State Trials, xxvi. 529-96), and in May 1798 James O'Coigley, Arthur O'Connor, and others, charged with high treason (ib. xxvi. 1191-1432, xxvii. 1-254). He was one of the counsel for the crown at the trial of Governor Wall for murder in January 1802 (ib. xxviii. 51-178), and at the trial of Edward Marcus Despard for high treason in February 1803 (ib. xxviii. 345-528). On 25 March 1805 he was appointed second justice on the North Wales circuit, and in 1800 successfully defended quittal for his client on all the charges preferred against him after a trial which lasted fifteen days (ib. xxix. 549-1482). In the same year he assisted Eldon and Perceval in the defence of the Princess of Wales against the charges brought against her, and in preparing the famous letter to the king of 2 Oct. 1806 in answer to the report of the 'Delicate Investigation.

On the formation of the Duke of Port-Plumer was appointed solicitor-general. He was sworn into office on 11 April, and was knighted on the 15th (London Gazette, 1807, p. 497). At a by-election in May he was returned to the House of Commons for Downton, which he continued to represent until his promotion to the bench in 1813. He appears to have spoken for the first time in the House on 22 Feb. 1808 (Parl. Debates, 1st ser. x. 608), and on 11 March following he upheld the 'justice, policy, and legality' of the orders in council (th. x. 1078). On 13 March 1809 he opposed the address to the crown with regard to the conduct of the Duke of York (ib. xiii. 415-20). During a debate on the criminal law in February 1810 Plumer declared that he was attached to the existing system of law, and 'extremely jealous in his views of any new theories' (ib. xv. 373), and in June following he opposed Grattan's motion to refer the Roman catholic petitions to a committee, being convinced that such a measure could 'lead to no practical good, but to much litigation and mischief' (ib. xvii. 274-94). He succeeded Sir Vicary Gibbs as attorney-general on 26 June 1812. In the spring of 1813 he opposed two of Romilly's measures for the amelioration of the criminal law, insisting that the severity of the existing laws was necessary for the security of the state (ib. xxv. 369-70, 582). He was appointed the first vice-chancellor of England on 10 April 1813, under the provisions of 53 George III, cap. 24, and was sworn a member of the privy council at Carlton House on 20 May following (London Gazette, 1813, i. 965).
'A worse appointment,' says Sir Samuel Romilly, 'than that of Plumer to be vicechancellor could hardly have been made. He knows nothing of the law of real property, nothing of the law of bankruptcy, and nothing of the doctrines peculiar to courts of equity (Memoirs of Sir Samuel Romilly, 1840, iii. 102). Through Plumer's exertions a grant was obtained from the treasury, by which a building appropriated to the use of the vice-chancellor was erected in Lincoln's Inn. After presiding as vice-chancellor of bar of the House of Lords in support of the England for nearly five years, he was promoted to the post of master of the rolls, in succession to Sir William Grant, on 7 Jan. 1818 ( London Gazette, 1818, i. 77). Ile died at the Rolls House in Chancery Lane on 24 March 1824, aged 70, and was buried in the Rolls Chapel on 1 April following.

Plumor was an able pleader, a learned lawyer, but a heavy and prolix speaker. He was for several years one of the leaders on the Oxford circuit, and he had a large practice in the court of exchequer. He was a great authority on tithe questions, and he was perhaps better acquainted with the law as applied to elections than any other person in the langdom' (WILSON, Biogr. Index to the House of Commons, 1808, p. 193). He does not appear to have taken any part in the numerous prosecutions instituted by Sir Vicary Gibbs while attornoy-general, except in the 'Independent Whig' case, when he addressed the House of Lords in support of the sentence pronounced by the king's bench against Hart and White (Howard, State Trials, xxx. 1337-46). As a judge he was distinguished by the courtesy of his demeanour and the length of his judgments. 'Plumer,' says Romilly, 'has great anxiety to do the duties of his office to the satisfaction of every one, and most beneficially for the suitors; but they are duties which he is wholly incapable of discharging (Memoirs of Sir Samuel Romilly, iii. 325). His judgments, 'though sneered at by some old chancery practitioners when they were delivered, are now,' says Campbell, 'read by the student with much profit, and are considered of high authority (Lires of the Lord Chancellors, 1867, ix. 367-8). They are to be found for the most part in the 'Reports' of Maddock, George Cooper, John Wilson, Swanston, Jacob and Walker, Jacob and Turner, and Russell.

Plumer for some years held the post of king's serjeant in the duchy of Lancaster. He was a trustee of the British Museum, and a fellow of the Royal Society and of the Society of Antiquaries. He served as treasurer of Lincoln's Inn in 1800.

A portrait of Plumer, by Sir Thomas Lawrence, is in the possession of Mrs. Hall Plumer, the widow of a grandson. It has been engraved by II. Robinson.

Two of Plumer's speeches were printed: one on behalf of the directors against Fox's East India Bill in 'The Case of the East India Company as stated and proved at the Bar of the House of Lords on the 15 and 16 Days of December, 1783, London, 1781, 8vo, and the other delivered in 1807 at the petition of the West India planters and merchants against the second reading of the bil, for the abolition of the slave trade, London, 1807, 8vo.

married, on 27 Aug. 1794, Plumer Marianne, eldest daughter of John Turton of Sugnall, near Eccleshall, Staffordshire, by whom he had five sons and two daughters. His widow died on 26 Nov. 1857 at Canons in the parish of Stanmore Parva, Middlesox, an estate which Plumer had purchased in 1811. One of his granddaughters became the wife of Sir Harry Smith Parkes [q. v.]

Lifose's Judges of England, 1864, ix. 32-6; Jordan's National Portrait Gallery, 1830-1, vol. iii.; Walpole's Life of Spencer Perceval, 1874, i. 202-6, Twis-'s Life of Lord Eldon, 1814, ii. 23-8, 240-3, 301; John Bell's Thoughts on the Proposed Alteration in the Court of Chancery, 1830, pp. 3-5; Shaw's History of Staffordshire. 1798, i. 183; Goorgian Era, 1883, ii. 545-6; Law and Lawyors, 1840, ii. 81-5; Gent, Mag. 1794 pt. ii. p. 766, 1824 pt. i. p. 640, 1858 pt. i. p. 114; Ann Reg. 1824, appendix to Chron. p. 217; Poster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886, iii. 1123; Lincoln's Inn Registers; Notes and Quories, 2nd sor. xii. 87, 214-15, Official Return of Lists of Members of Parliament, pt. ii. pp. 250, 266; Haydn's Book of Dignities, 1890, Brit. Mus. Cat. | G. F. B. B.

PLUMPTON, SIR WILLIAM (1404-1480), soldier, born 7 Oct. 1401, was eldest son of Sir Robert Plumpton (1383-1121) of Plumpton, Yorkshire, by Alice, daughter of Sir Godfroy Foljambe of Hassop, Derbyshire. His family had been settled at Plumpton from the twelfth century, and hold of the earls of Northumberland as overlords. Accordingly the Earl of Northumberland had his wardship till he was of age. About 1427 he set out for the French wars; he was knighted before 1430, when he returned. He probably went to France again very shortly, as he is mentioned as one of the captains in the retinue of the Duke of Bedford in 1435. He was seneschal and master-forester of the honour and forest, and constable of the castle of Knaresborough from about 1430 to 1461, and in connection with this office he had serious trouble in 1441, when a flerce and sanguinary quarrel broke out between the tenants of the forest and the servants of Archbishop John Kemp [q. v.] as to payment of toll at fairs. On 20 Feb. 1411-2 he was appointed by the Earl of Northumberland seneschal of all his manors in Yorkshire with a fee of 101. for life; the fee was doubled for good service in 1447. In 1448 he was sheriff for Yorkshire, and in 1452 for Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire. He continued closely connected with the Percy family, and in 1450 joined the musters of the Earl of Northumberland for a raid into Scotland. This family connection drew him, like most of the northern gentlemen, to the Lancastrian side in the wars of the Roses. In 1460 he was a commissioner to inquire into the estates of the attainted Yorkists. In 1461 the series of letters addressed to Sir William Plumpton which forms part of the 'Plumpton Correspondence' begins. On 12 March 1460-1 King Henry wrote from York telling him to raise men from Knaresborough and come to him. The next day a second letter urged him to hasten. joined the royal army and fought at Towton, where his son William was killed. Sir William either gave himself up or was taken prisoner, and decided to submit. He obtained a pardon from Edward IV on 5 Feb. 1461-2. For some time, however, he was not allowed to go into the north of England, and in 1468 was tried and acquitted on a charge of treason by a jury at Hounslow, Middlesex. He now recovered his offices of constable of the castle and forester of the forest of Knaresborough; but, like most of the people of the north, he must have made some move in the Lancastrian interest in 1471, as he secured a general pardon for all offences committed up to 30 Sept. 1471, and at the same time lost his offices at Knaresborough.

He died on 15 Oct. 1480. He married, first, some time after 20 Jan. 1415-16, the date of the marriage covenant, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Bryan Stapilton of Carlton, Yorkshire; she died before 1451. By her Sir William had seven daughters, all of whom married, and two sons, Robert and William; Robert died in 1450, being betrothed to Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas, lord Clifford; upon his death Elizabeth married his brother William; the latter was killed at Towton in 1461, leaving two daughters. After the first wife's death, or perhaps before it, Sir William had two bastard sons, Robert and William. Great scandal was caused at a later date by his relations with Joan, daughter of Thomas Winteringham of Winteringham Knaresborough. In consequence, Sir William was summoned before the ecclesiastical court of York, where he appeared in 1467-1468, and declared that he had been privately married to the lady in 1451. After some delay the court decided in 1472 that this was true, and from that time Robert, the offspring of this marriage, was regarded as heir. To make all sure, his father made him a gift of his personal property.

This Str Robert Plumpton (1463-1523) was involved in various disputes with his father's other heirs. He was knighted by the Duke of Gloucester, near Berwick, 22 Aug. 1482, when following his master, the Earl of Northumberland, but he supported Henry VII after he had secured the crown, and went to meet the king on his northern progress in the first year of his reign. He was also present at the coronation of Queen Elizabeth on 25 Nov. 1487. That he was trusted by the king may be gathered from the lease granted to him on 5 May 1488 of mills at Knaresborough and Kilinghale, and he took an active part in repressing the outbreaks in Yorkshire of April 1489 and May 1492; Henry thanked him in a letter which is printed among the 'Plumpton Correspondence.' Despite this evidence of his loyalty. Despite this evidence of his loyalty, Empson fixed his claws in the Plumpton inheritance, and raked up the old claims of the heirs-general of Sir William Plumpton. In 1502 the verdict went against Sir Robert; but he appealed to the king, who made him a knight of the body, and in 1503 he was protected from the results of the action. dispute was not, however, finished; and when Henry VIII came to the throne, Sir Robert, who was penniless, was imprisoned in the counter. He was soon afterwards released and an arrangement made by which he was restored to his estate on an award. He died in the summer of 1523. He married, first, Agnes (d. 1504), daughter of Sir William Gascoigne of Gawthorp, Yorkshire; by her he had a large family, of whom William Plumpton was the eldest son. Sir Robert's second wife was Isabel, daughter of Ralph, lord Neville, by whom he does not appear to have left any issue.

The 'Plumpton Correspondence' was preserved in a manuscript book of copies which passed into the hands of Christopher Towneley about 1650, and remained among the Towneley MSS.; it consisted of letters written during the time of Sir William Plumpton and later members of his family down to 1551. It was edited for the Camden Society by Thomas Stapleton [q.v.] in 1858-9 (2 vols.); the letters illustrated by the editor by extracts from a manuscript in the same collection, the 'Coucher Book' of Sir Edward Plump-[Plumpton Correspondence, ed. Stapleton (Camden Soc.); Wars of the English in France (Rolls Ser.), ed. Stevenson, ii. 433; Materials for the Hist. of Henry VII (Rolls Ser.), ii. 300.] W. A. J. A.

PLUMPTRE, Miss ANNA or ANNE (1760-1818), author, born in 1760, was second daughter of Dr. Robert Plumptre [q.v.], president of Queens' College, Cambridge. Her brother, James Plumptre, is separately noticed. She was well educated and was skilled in foreign languages, particularly in German. She commenced author with some slight articles in periodicals. The freethinking Alexander Geddes [q.v.] encouraged her. Her first book, a novel in two volumes, entitled 'Antoinette,' was published anonymously, but acknowledged in a second edition. Miss Plumptre was one of the first to make German plays known in London, and in 1798 and 1790 translated many of the dramas of Kotzebue, following up this work with a 'Life and Literary Career of Kotzebue,' translated from the German and published in 1801. From 1802 to 1805 she resided in France, and published her experiences in 1810 in the 'Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in France' (3 vols.) Miss Brightwell (Memorials of Mrs. Opie, p. 97) states that Miss Plumptre accompanied the Opies to Paris in August 1802. In 1814-15 Miss Plumptre visited Iroland, and again recorded her experiences in the 'Narrative of a Residence in Ireland,' published in 1817. It was ridiculed in the 'Quarterly' (vol. xvi.) by Croker (Smiles, Memoirs of John Murray, i. 342)

Miss Plumptre's other contributions to literature consist mainly of translations of travels from the French and German. She was well known as at once a democrat and an extravagant worshipper of Napoleon. In 1810 she declared that she would welcome him if he invaded England, because he would do away with the aristocracy and give the country a better government (Orann Robinson, Diary, i. 156). One of her most intimate friends was Helen Maria Williams [q.v.], the poetess. Miss Plumptre died at Norwich on 20 Oct. 1818.

Other works by Anne Plumptro are: 1. 'The Rector's Son: a Novel,' 3 vols. 1798. 2. 'Pizarro, or the Spaniards in Peru: a Tragedy, 1799. 3. Letters written from various Parts of the Continent between the years 1785 and 1794, containing a variety of Anecdotes relative to the Present State of Literature in Germany, and the celebrated German Literati, with an Appendix, from the German of Matthison, 1799. 4. 'Physionomical travels, from the German of Musaus, 8 vols. 1800. 5. Something New; or Adventures at Campbell House, 3 vols. 1801. 6. 'Historical Relation of the Plague at Marseilles in 1720,' from the French manuscript of Bortrand, 1805. 7. 'The History of Myself and my Friend: a Novel,' 4 vols. 1812. 8. 'Travels in Southern Africa (1803-1806),' from the German of IT. Lichtenstein, 1812; 2 vols. 1815. 9. 'Travels through the Morea, Albania, and other parts of the Ottoman Empire;' from the French of F. C.

Pouqueville, M.D., 1813, 1826. 16. 'Voyages and Travels to Brazil, the South Sea, Camscatka, and Japan,' &c., from the German of Langsdorf, 2 vols. 1813-14. 11. 'Tales of Wonder, of Honour, and of Sentiment, Original and Translated,' 3 vols. 1818.

In the last work Miss Plumptre was aided by her sister, Annabella Plumptre (A. 1795-1812), the third daughter of the family, who was the author on her own account of the following: 1. 'Montgomery, or Scenes in Wales: a Novel,' 2 vols. 2. 'The Mountain Cottage: a tale from the German.' 3. 'The Foresters: a play from the German of Iffland,' 1790. 4. 'Domestic Stories,' from the German of different authors. 5. 'The Western Mail: a Collection of Letters.' 6. 'The Guardian Angel,' a tale from the German of Kotzelue. 7. 'Stories for Children,' 1801. 8. 'Domestic Management, or the Health Cookery Book,' 1810; 2nd edit. 1812.

[Beloe's Saxagenarian, i. 363-7; Biogr. Diet, of Living Authors, 1816; Gent. Mag. 1818, ii. 571; Burke's Landed Gentry, 1894, ii. 1620; Allibone's Dictionary, ii. 1611.]

PLUMPTRE, CHARLES JOHN (1818-1887), barrister and writer on elecution, born on 28 March 1818, was elder brother of Edward Hayes Plumptre [q. v.], doan of Wells. After receiving an education at private schools and King's College, London, he was entered at Gray's Inn in May 1838, and was called to the bar in June 1811. In conjunction with George Harris he edited vols. xi. and xii. of 'The County Courts' Chronicle,' and, in conjunction with Mr. Serjeant Edward William Cox [q. v.], between 1850 and 1860 he established the first ponny readings for the people. His fine presence and remarkable command of the modulations of a sweet and powerful voice led him to devote especial attention to the study and practice of elocution. He gradually withdrow from practice at the bar and devoted his chief attention to lecturing on his favourite art, especially at the universities and at the various theological colleges, where his instructions were highly valued. He held official appointments as lecturer on elecution both at ()xford and at King's College. In 1861 he published a course of lectures delivered at Oxford in 1800; these subsequently formed the basis of a large work, 'The Principles and Practice of Elecution' (Loudon, 1861, 8vo), which was dedicated to the Prince of Wales, and has gone through five editions. He died on 15 June 1887.

| Times, 21 June 1887; Men at the Bar; Men of the Time, 1868; private information.]
R. G.

EDWARD PLUMPTRE, HAYES (1821-1891), dean of Wells and biographer of Bishop Ken, came of a family originally of Nottingham [see PLUMPTER, HINEY]. The branch to which Edward belonged subsequently removed to Fredville in Kent. He was born on 6 Aug. 1821, being the son of Edward Hallows Plumptre, a London solicitor. Charles John Plumptre [q. v.] was his brother. He was educated at home, and (after a brief stay at King's College, London) entered Oxford as a scholar of University College, of which his uncle, Frederick Charles Plumptre (1796-1870), was master from 1836 till his death. In 1844 he took a double firstclass, alone in mathematics, and in classics with Sir George Bowen, Dean Bradley, and E. Poste. He was elected to a fellowship at Brasenose, which he resigned three years afterwards, on his marriage with Harriet Theodosia, sister of Frederick Denison Maurice [q. v.] For some years the influence of his brother-in-law was apparent in his religious views, but as he advanced in life he identified himself with no party. Ordained in 1846 by Bishop Wilberforce, he proceeded M.A. in 1847, and joined the staff of King's College, London. There his work mainly lay for twenty-one years, and he enlarged the scope of the institution by introducing evening classes. From 1847 to 1868 he was chaplain there, from 1853 to 1863 professor of pastoral theology, and from 1864 to 1881 professor of exegesis. He proved a most sympathetic teacher, and took a genuine interest in the future welfare of his pupils. He also took a leading part in promoting the higher education of women as a professor of Quenn's College, Harley Street, where he held the office of principal during the last two years of his work there (1875-7).

Throughout this period he was also occupied in clerical work. From 1851 to 1858 he was assistant preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1863 prebendary of St. Paul's. He was rector of Pluckley from 1869 and of Bickley from 1873. He was Boyle lecturer in 1866, and the lectures were afterwards published under the title of 'Christ and Christendom.' From 1869 to 1874 he was a member of the Old Testament rovision committee, and from 1872 to 1874 Grinfield lecturer and examiner at Oxford.

In 1881 he resigned his work in London on becoming dean of Wells. He was an ideal dean, possessing a genuine talent for business, and being always ready to consider the suggestions of others. Not only the cathedral and the Theological College, but the city of Wells, its hospital, its almshouse, and its workhouse, commanded his service.

Meanwhile his pen was never idle. He wrote much on the interpretation of scripture, endeavouring to combine and popularise, in no superficial fashion, the results attained by labourers in special sections of the subject. He contributed to the commentaries known respectively as the 'Cambridge Bible,' the 'Speaker's Commentary,' that edited by Bishop Ellicott, and the 'Bible Educator.' He also wrote 'Biblical Studies,' 1870 (3rd edit. 1885), 'St. Paul in Asia' (1877), a 'Popular Exposition of the Epistles to the Seven Churches' (1877 and 1879), 'Movements in Religious Thought: Romanism, Protestantism, Agnosticism' (1879), and 'Theology and Life' (1884). His most remarkable theological work was 'The Spirits in Prison, and other studies on Life after Death' (1884 and 1885). The book comprises a review of previous teaching on the subject of eschatology. His characteristic sympathy with 'the larger hope' is moderated throughout by a characteristic caution. He had passed beyond the influence of Maurice, and, though his loyal admiration for his earlier teacher remained unchanged, he had rejected his conclusions.

In 1888 he issued a little work on 'Wells Cathedral and its Deans,' and in the same year appeared his 'Life of Bishop Ken.' Though diffuse, the book has something of the charm of Walton's 'Lives,' and breathes the still air of a cathedral. Its main defect is the occasional intrusion of conjectural or 'ideal' biography.

Plumptre published several volumes of verse. He had a keen perception of literary excellence, unappeasable ambition, and unwearied industry; but his gifts were hardly sufficient to insure him a place among the poets. 'Lazarus' and other poems appeared in 1864, 8vo (3rd edit. 1868); 'Master and Scholar,' which was warmly pressed in the 'Westminster Review,' in 1806, 8vo; and 'Things New and Old' in 1884, 8vo. All his pieces are refined and earnest; few are really forcible. Several of Plumptre's hymns have been admitted into popular collections, and satisfy their not very exacting requirements. He also translated with much success the plays of Sophocles (1865) and of Æschylus (1868), and thus gave readers ignorant of Greek some adequate conception of the masterpieces of Attic drama. twenty years he studied Dante, and his English version of Dante's work appeared as The Divina Commedia and Canzoniere of Dante Alighieri; with Biographical Introduction, Notes and Essays' (vol. i. 1880, 8vo, vol. ii. 1887). Plumptre's notes condense all that history or tradition can tell us of the author. But the translation itself is hampered by a too strict adherence, in our stubborn tongue, to the metrical form of the original.

Plumptro died on 1 Feb. 1891 at the dosnory of Wolls, and was buried in the cathedral cemetery beside his wife, who had predeceased him on 3 April 1880. The marriage was childless.

[Obituary notices, Funeral Sermons by Canon Buckle and Principal Gibson; notice by the latter in the Diocesan Kalendar, 1892; Dean Spence's article in Good Words, April 1891; Julian's Dict. of Hymnology; Times, 12 Feb. 1891; personal knowledge.]

PLUMPTRE, IIIENRY (d. 1716), president of the Royal College of Physicians, was the second son of Henry Plumptre of Nottingham, by his second wife, Joyce (d. 1708), daughter of Henry Sacheverell of Barton, and widow of John Milward of Snitterton, Derbyshire. His grandfather, Huntingdon Plumptre, graduated B.A. from Trinity Hall, Cambridge, 1622, M.A. 1626, and M.D. 1631, was 'accounted the best physician at Nottingham,' and was author of a rare work, 'Epigrammaton Opusculum duobus Libellis distinctum, London, 1029, 12mo, which he dedicated to Sir John Byron; one copy was presented to Francis Prujean [q. v.], and another to the library of St. John's College, Cambridge, If also translated Homer's 'Batrachomyomachia' into Latin verse (Wood, Fasti, ii. 101; Memoirs of Colonel Mutchinson, ed. Firth, passim; Niunous, Lit. Anecdotes, viii. 389; Notes and Queries, 3rd sor. viii. 470). The father Honry was implicated in a disturbance that arose out of James II's proceedings against the charter of Nottingham corporation, and at the trial his name afforded Jeffreys an opportunity for one of his brutal pleasantries. His elder son John was father of Robert Plumptre [q. v.]

Henry, born at Nottingham, was admitted a pensioner of Queens' College, Cambridge, on 19 Jan. 1607-8, and graduated B.A. in 1701-2, M.A. in 1705, and M.D. per literas regias in 1706. In the latter year he was one of those appointed by the university to carry a complimentary letter to the university of Frankfort on the occasion of its jubileo. On 15 Feb. 1702-3 he was elected follow of his college, but vacated the office by not taking orders on 4 July 1707. He was admitted a candidate of the College of Physicians on 22 Dec. 1707, and fellow on 28 Dec. 1708. The delivered the Gulstonian lectures in 1711, the Harvoian oration in 1722, and on 19 March 1732-3 was appointed Lumleian lecturer. He was consor in 1717, 1722, 1723, and 1726, registrar from 1718 to 1722, treasurer on 18 July 1725, and consiliarius in 1735, 1738, and 1739. He was named an olect on 5 May 1727, and served as president for six years from 1740 to 1745. He was also physician at St. Thomas's Hospital, a post he resigned in 1736. He died on 26 Nov. 1746 of an ulcer in his bladder. A portrait of Plumptre was presented by himself to the College of Physicians on 1 Oct. 1744. He was author of : 1. 'Dissortatio Medico-Physica de Carolinis Thermis, Magdeburg, 1695, 4to; another edition, 1705, 4to. 2. 'Oratio Anniversaria Harvæana, London, 1722, 4to. He is also said to have written a pamphlet entitled 'A serious Conference between Scaramouch and Harlequin,' with reference to the controversy then raging between Dr. Woodward and Dr. John Freind, and he devoted much time and energy to the fifth 'Pharma-copeeia Londinensis' which appeared in 1746.

Lis son, Russell Phumptrn (1709-1793), born on 4 Jan. 1709, was admitted pensioner of Queens' College, Cambridge, on 12 June 1728, proceeded M.B. 1738, and M.D. 1738; he was admitted candidate of the College of Physicians on 30 Sept. 1738, and fellow on 1 Oct. 1739. In 1741 he was appointed regims professor of physic at Cambridge. He died at Cambridge on 15 Oct. 1798. His library was sold in 1796 (Mason's Gray, 1827, p. 328).

[Authorities quoted; works in Brit, Mus, Library; Graduati Cantabr.; Mank's Coll. of Phys. ii. 24-5, 144; Rouse's Memoirs of Dr. Froind, 1731, p. 84; Gont. Mag. 1746 p 613, 1793 ii. 963, 966; Nichols's Lit. Anced. i. 586, ii. 668, iv. 236, v. 564, vin. 264, 389-90, ix. 566; Bentham's Ely, p. 280, App. p. 16; Thoroton's Nottinghamshire, ii. 80; Doeving's Nottingham; Hasted's Kont, iii. 710; Berry's Connty Genealogies, 'Kont.;' Burke's Lauded Gentry, 1891, ii. 1620; Notes and Quories, 3rd ser. viii, 470, x. 430.

PLUMPTRE, JAMES (1770-1882), dramatist and divine, born in 1770, was the second son of Robert Plumptre [q. v.], president of Queens' College, Cambrulge, by his wife, Anne Newcome. His sister Anna is separately noticed, James was educated at Dr. Henry Newcome's school at Hackney, where he took part in amateur theatricals, and acquired a strong taste for the drama. In 1788 lie entered at Queens' College, Cambridge, but migrated to Olaro Hall, whence he graduated B.A. in 1792, M.A. in 1795, and B.D. in 1808. In 1703 he was elected fellow of Olare. On 18 May 1812 he was presented to the living of Great Gransden, Huntingdonshire, which he held till his death there on 23 Jan. 1832. He was unmarried.

Plumptro devoted himself chiefly to dramatic literature. Ife wrote plays, advocated the claims of the stage as a moral educator, and endeavoured to improve its tone. He also wrote some religious books. Besides pamphlets, letters, single sermons, and hymns, he published: 1. 'The Coventry Act; a Comedy,' 1793, 8vo. 2. 'A concise View of the History of Religious Knowledge, 1794, 12mo. 3. 'Osway: a Tragedy,' 1795, 4to. 4. 'The Lakers: a Comic Opera,' 1798, 8vo. 5. 'A Collection of Songs.'. selected and revised,' 3 vols., 1806, 12mo. 6. 'Four Discourses relating to the Stage, 1809, 8vo. 7. 'The Vocal Repository, 1809, 8vo. 8. 'The English Drama purified, 3vols. 1812; a selection of expurental plants. tion of expurgated plays. 9. 'Three Discourses on the Case of Animal Creation,' 1816, 12mo. 10. 'The Experienced Butcher,' 1816,12mo. 11. 'Original Dramas,'1818,8vo. 12. 'A Selection from the Fables by John Gay, 1823, 12mo. 13. 'One Hundred Fables in Verse, by various Authors, 1825, 8vo. 14. 'Robinson Crusoe, edited by Rev. James Plumptre, 1826; republished in 1882 by the S.P.O.K. 15. 'A Popular Commentary on the Bible,' 2 vols. 1827, 8vo.

PIUMPTRD, JOHN (1753-1825), dean of Gloucester, cousin and brother-in-law of the preceding, born in 1753, was the eldest son of Septimus, younger brother of Robert Plumptre [q.v.] He was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1775, graduated B.A. in 1777, and M.A. in 1780. In 1778 he was presented to the vicarage of Stone, Worcestershire, in 1787 was elected prebendary of Worcester, in 1790 rector of Wichenford, and in 1808 dean of Gloucester. He died on 26 Nov. 1825, having married his cousin Diana, daughter of Robert Plumptre. She died on 18 June 1825, leaving three sons. Plumptre was a good classical scholar, and published: 1. 'Ecloga Sacra Alexandri Pope, vulgo Messia dicta, Græce reddita, 1795, 4to; 2nd edit. 1796, to which was appended 'Inscriptio sepulchralis ex celeberrima elegia Thomas Gray [etiam Grace reddita].' 2. 'Miltonis Poema Lycidas Græce redditum, 1797, 4to. 3. 'The Elegies of C. Pedo Albinovanus . . . with an English version,' London, 1807, 12mo. From the place of publication it would seem that he was also author of The Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion,' 2 vols. Kidderminster, 1795, 8vo. which is anonymous, and has been attributed to his cousin, James Plumptre.

[Works in Brit. Mus. Library; Gent. Mag. 1825 i. 651, ni. 646, 1832 i. 369; Biogr. Diet. of Living Authors, 1816; Biogr. Dram. vol. i. pt. ii. p. 575; Pantheon of the Age; McClintock and Strong's Cyclop.; Fostor's Index Eccl.; Forstor's Lafe, i. 842; Le Neve's Fasti, i. 445;

Allibone's Dict. of English Lit.; Burke's Landed Gentry, 1894, ii. 1620, Notes and Queries, 1-t ser x. 104, 2nd ser. 1v. 66 ]

PLUMPTRE, ROBERT (1728-1788), president of Queens' College, Cambridge, was youngest of ten children of John Plumpire, a gentleman of moderate estate in Nottinghamshire, and was grandson of Henry Plumptre [q. v.] He was educated by Dr. Henry Newcome at Hackney, and matriculated as a pensioner of Queens' College, Cambridge, on 11 July 1741. He proceeded B.A. 1744, M.A. 1748, D.D. 1761, and on 21 March 1745 was elected fellow of his college. In 1752 (19 Oct.) he was instituted to the rectory of Wimpole, Cambridgeshire, on the presentation of Lord-chancellor Hardwicke; at the same time he held the vicarage of Whaddon. In 1756 Lord Hardwicke made him prebendary of Norwich. In 1760 he was elected president of his college, and in 1769 professor of casuistry. These offices, together with his preferments, he held till his death. He was vice-chancellor 1760-1 and 1777-

Dr. Plumptre interested himself in the history of his college, and left some manuscript collections for it. In the university he supported the movement inaugurated by Dr. John Jebb (1730-1786) [q. v.] in favour of annual examinations, and was a member of the syndicate appointed on 17 Feb. 1774 to devise a scheme for carrying them out, which was rejected on 19 April in the same year. He is also stated to have been in favour of granting relief to the clergy, who in 1772 petitioned against subscription to the thirty-nine articles. He published in 1782 a pam-phlet called 'Hints respecting some of the University Officers, of which a second edition appeared in 1802. Latin poems by him occur among the congratulatory verses published by the university in 1761 on the occasion of the marriage of George III in 1762, on the birth of a Prince of Wales, and in 1763 on the restoration of peace. These compositions show that he was a respectable scholar, and that the story of his having made false quantities in his vice-chancellor's speech, which were strung into the line-is probably a calumny.

Rogërus immēmor Robertum denōtat hebētem -

Dr. Plumptre died at Norwich on 29 Oct. 1788. There is a tablet to his memory on the south side of the presbytery. There is a portrait of him in the president's lodge, Queens' College. He married, in September 1756, Anne, second daughter of Dr. Henry Newcome, his former schoolmaster. By her he had ten children. His son James and two of his daughters, Anne and Annabella, are separately noticed [see under Prumptru, Anna].

[Gent. Mag. vol. lviii (for 1788); Dyer's Hist. of Univ. of Cambridge, i. 125, ii. 158; Cooper's Annals, iv. 370; Wordsworth's Scholæ Academicæ, p. 106.]

J. W. C-k.

PLUMRIDGE, STR JAMES HANWAY (1787-1863), vice-admiral, born in 1787, entered the navy in September 1799 on board the Osprey sloop on the home station. He afterwards served in the Leda in the expedition to Egypt, with Captain George Hope, whom he followed to the Defence, and in her he was present in the battle of Trafalgar. He was then for a few months in the Melpomene with Captain (afterwards Sir Peter) Parker (1785-1814) [q. v.], and again with Hope in the Theseus. On 20 Aug. 1806 he was promoted to the rank of licutement, and served continuously during the war, in (among other ships) the Melpomene in 1809, and the Menelaus in 1810 (again with Parker) and in the Caledonia as flag-lieutonant to Sir Edward Pellew, afterwards Viscount Exmouth [q. v.] On 7 June 1814 he was promoted to the command of the Crocus sloop, and from her, in July, he was appointed to the Philomel, in which he went to the East Indies. In 1817 he returned to England as acting-captain of the Amphitrite. The promotion was not confirmed, and from 1818 to 1821 he commanded the Sappho brig at St. Helena, and afterwards on the Irish station. He was advanced to post rank on 9 Oct. 1822. From 1831 to 1835 he commanded the Magicienne frigate in the East Indies, from 1837 to 1841 was superintendent of the Falmouth packets, and from 1842 to 1847 was storekeeper of the ordnance. From 1841 to 1847 he was M.P. for Falmouth. In 1847 he was appointed to the Cambrian frigate for service in the East Indies, and on 18 Oct. was ordered to wear a broad pennant as second in command on the station. He returned to England towards the end of 1850, and on 7 Oct. 1852 was promoted to be rear-admiral. In 1854, with his flag in the Leopard, he commanded the flying squadron in the Baltic, and especially in the Gulf of Bothnia. In the following February he was appointed superintendent of Devonport dockyard, and on 5 July was nominated a K.C.B. On 28 Nov. 1857 he was promoted to be vice-admiral. He had no further service, and died at Hopton Hall in Suffolk on 29 Nov. 1863. He was three times married, and left issue.

[O'Byrne's Nav. Biogr. Dict.; Navy Lists; Times, 2 and 3 Dec. 1863; Earp's Hist. of the Baltic Campaign.] J. K. L.

PLUNKET, CHRISTOPHER, second EARL OF FINGALL (d. 1649), was the eldest son of Lucas Plunket, styled Lucas Mor. tenth lord Killoen, created Earl of Fingall on 26 Sept. 1628, by his second wife, Susanna, fifth daughter of Edward, lord Brabazon. His father died in 1637, and on 20 March that year Plunket received special livery of his estates. Ho took his seat in the Irish parliament on 16 March 1639, and was a member of several committees for privileges and grievances, On the outbreak of the rebellion in October 1641, he endeavoured, like the nobility and gentry of the l'ale generally, to maintain an attitude of neutrality between the government and the northern party, and on 16 Nov. was appointed a commissioner to confer with all persons in arms, with a view to suspend for some time the sad effects of licentiousness and rapine, until the kingdom was put in a better posture of defence.' His behaviour caused him to be mistrusted by government, and on 17 Nov. he was pro-claimed an outlaw. He thereupon took a prominent part in bringing about an alliance between the Ulster party and the nobility and gentry of the Pale. He was present at the meeting at the Hill of Crofty, and subsequently at that at the Hill of Tara, where he was approinted general of the horse for the county of Meath. His name is attached to the principal documents drawn up by the confederates in justification of their taking up arms. He was a member of the general assembly, and, by taking the oath of association against the papal nuncio Rinuccini in June 1048, proved his fidelity to the original demands of the confederates; but otherwise he played an inconspicuous part in the history of the rebellion. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Rathmines on 2 Aug. 1649, died in confinement in Dublin Castle a fortnight later, and was buried in St. Catherine's Church on 18 Aug. He was seven times indicted for high treason, and his estates were confiscated by the act for the speedy settlement of Ireland on 12 Aug. 1652.

Plunketmarried Mabel, daughter of Nicholas Barnewall, first viscount Kingsland, who survived him, and married, in 1653, Colonel James Barnewall, youngest son of Bir Patrick Barnewall. Bis eldest son and heir, Luke, third earl of Fingall, was restored to his estates and honours by order of the court of claims in 1662.

[Lodgo's Peerage, ed. Archdall, vi. 185-6; Gilbort's History of the Confederation and History of Contemporary Affairs (Irish Archæological Society). In the article in Webb's Compendium of Irish Biography, Plunket is confounded with his kinsman, Colonel Richard Plunkst, son of Sir Christopher Plunket of Donsoghly.] R. D.

PLUNKET, JOHN (1664-1788), Jacobite agent, born in Dublin in 1664, was educated at the Jesuits' College at Vienna. He was a Roman catholic layman, and he was sometimes known under the alies of Rogers. He was for over twenty years in the service of the leading Jacobites, either as a spy or diplomatic agent, and his wide personal acquaintance with the statesmen of many countries illustrated the facility with which Jacobite agents approached men of the highest position. By generals and divines, by English, French, and Dutch ministers, he was received with politeness, plied with anxious inquiries about the health of James, and dismissed with promises of support, not perhaps sincere, but always fervent. hopes of the Jacobites were naturally raised by the rout of the whigs in England in 1710. A number of the party were convinced that Harley was at heart a Jacobite, and that the negotiations which commenced with France in the autumn of 1711 were a preliminary to secret negotiations with the Pretender. Plunket therefore thought to improve the position of his employers by revealing to the tory ministry fictitious whig machinations against the success of the peace. Prince Eugène came to England in January 1712, and excited much uneasiness by his frequent conferences held at Leicester House with Marlborough, the imperial envoy (Gallas), the leading Hanoverians, and the whig opponents of the peace. Accordingly, in March 1712, Plunket sent to Harley, now Earl of Oxford, two forged letters purporting to have been written by Eugène, and sent to Count Zinzendorf, the imperial ambassador at The Hague, for transmission to Vienna. According to these letters, outrages in London and the assassination of the tory chiefs were to be the means employed to upset the government and frustrate the peace. The forged letters did not for a moment deceive Oxford. They created, however, strong prejudice against Prince Eugène in influential quarters in England, and were skilfully used by St. John to convince Torcy and the French negotiators, newly assembled at Utrecht, of the danger the ministry ran in trying to conclude peace against the wishes of a powerful faction.

Meanwhile Plunket, disgusted by the incredulity of Oxford, brought his pretended revelations before Lord-keeper Harcourt and the Duke of Buckinghamshire, by whom they were submitted to the privy council. On 3 April Plunket was summoned, and, in answer to much questioning, stated that he had derived his information through a clerk in Zinzendorfs suite at The Hague. He was dismissed with a half-contemptuous direction to go over to Holland and bring back his friend. Though he must have known the facts, Swift treats the libels as substantially true in his flagrantly partisan 'Four closing Years of Queen Anne, while Macpherson prints them, and makes similar deductions, in his 'Original Papers.' After a further period of foreign travel and intrigue, during which he made more than one visit to Rome and had several interviews with the Pretender, Plunket returned to England in 1718, and five years later was charged with complicity in Layer's plot for seizing the Tower of London [see LAYER, CHRISTOPHER]. He was arrested by special warrant in January 1723, as he was about to leave his lodgings in Lambeth. He was proved to have written letters to Middleton, Dillon, and other prominent Jacobites, urging them to secure the co-operation of the regent of France at any price, and promising a wide support in England; there was also evidence that he had endeavoured to corrupt some sergeants in the British army. The bill for inflicting certain pains and penalties upon John Plunket was read in the House of Commons a second time on 28 March 1723. Plunket made no defence. Subsequently, before the House of Lords, he tried to establish that he was a person of no consideration in Jacobite counsels, a contention which derived support from his repellently ugly appearance, but was conclusively disproved by his correspondence. Eventually Plunket was confined as a state prisoner in the Tower until July 1738, when 'at the public expense he was removed into private lodgings and cut for the stone by Mr. Cheselden' [see Cheselden, William]. operation failed owing to Plunket's advanced age, and he died in James Street, near Red Lion Street, in the following August. He was buried in the churchyard of St. Pancras. John is to be carefully distinguished from his cousin, Matthew Plunket, 'serjeant of invalids,' a man of the lowest character, who gave damning evidence against his old crony, Christopher Layer.

[Hist. Reg. 1723 passim, 1738 p. 32; Wyon's Hist. of the Reign of Queen Anne, ii. 368; Stanhope's Hist. of Engl. 1839, i. 76; Coxe's Life of Marlborough, 1848, iii. 260; Macpherson's Original Papers, ii. 284; Boyer's Annals, passim; Le-grelle's Succession d'Espagne, v. 600-40; Dumont's Lettres Historiques, 1710; Mémoires de Torcy, 1767, ii. 271-4; Swift's Four closing Years of Queen Anne; Bolingbroke's Works, 1798, vol. v.; Doran's Jacobite London; Howell's State Trials, vol. xvi.; Cobbett's Parl. Hist. viii. 54.] T. S.

PLUNKET, NICHOLAS (A. 1641), provided a ransom. On his arrival at Rome compiler, is known only as author of a contemporary account of affairs in Ireland in under Professor Dandoni, and afterwards 1641, which Carte frequently cites in his 'Life of Ormonde.' 'It,' wrote Carte, 'would make a very large volume in folio, and is a collection of a vast number of relations of passages that happened in the Trish wars, made by a society of gentlemen who lived in that time, and were eye-witnesses of many of those passages. In 1741, the compiler's grandson, Henry Plunket, co. Meath, issued proposals for printing by subscription 'A faithful History of the Rebellion and Civil War in Ireland from its beginning, in the year 1641, to its conclusion, written by Nicholas Plunket, esq., and communicated to Mr. Dryden, who revised, corrected, and approved it.' The subscription was one guinea per copy. The book, it was stated, would contain about 180 sheets, printed in a neat letter.' In Harris's work on the 'Writers of Ireland, issued in 1740, Plunket's book was mentioned as still unpublished. No more was long heard of it, and portions of the manuscript appear to have been subsequently lost or destroyed. About 1830 a fragment of the manuscript came, with some of the Plunket estates, into the possession of General Francis Plunket Dunne, M.P. for the King's County. An account of this fragment by the present writer was printed in the description of the Plunkot manuscript in the time. All the new prelates agreed that second report of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts. Carte seems to have somewhat over-estimated the value and impartiality of the manuscript.

[Carte's Life of Ormondo, 1736, vol. i.; Harris's Writers of Ireland, 1746; Rep. of Royal Comm. on Hist. MSS, 1871.] Ĵ.TG.

PLUNKET, OLIVER (1020-1081), Roman catholic archbishop of Armagh and PLUNKET, titular primate of Iroland, was born at Loughcrow in Meath. His father's name is nowhere mentioned, but he was nearly related on that side to Christopher Plunket, second earl of Fingall [q. v.], and on his mother's to the Dillons, earls of Roscommon. He was also connected with his namesake, the sixth Lord Louth, and with Richard Talbot [q. v.] and his brother Peter [q. v.] He was educated from infancy to his sixteenth year by Lord Fingall's brother, Patrick Plunket, titular abbot of St. Mary's, Dublin, and afterwards bishop of Ardagh and Meath successively. In 1645 he accompanied Father Scarampi to Rome, narrowly escaping capture by pirates, or perhaps parliamentary cruisers, in the English Channel. In Flanders they fell among thieves, but an unnamed sameritan

Plunket studied rhetoric for about a year entered the Irish or Ludovisian College, then under jesuit control. There he remained eight years, becoming a proficient in mathematics, theology, and philosophy. It was a rule of the foundation that priests on completing their course should return to Ireland, but in July 1654 Plunket begged leave of Nickel, the general of the jesuits, to continuo his studies among the oratorians at San Girolamo della Carità. This was granted on the understanding that he was to go to Ireland at any moment when ordered by the general, or others his superiors. From 1657 to 1669 Plunket filled the chair of theology at the Propaganda College, and his learning was utilised by the congregation of the Index. Among his friends were Scarampi, the oratorian, who befriended Plunkot until October 1650, when he died of the plague, and Cardinal Pallavicini, the historian of the council of Trent from a point of view opposite to Sarpi's,

At the end of 1668 there were but two Roman catholic bishops resident in Ireland, of whom Patrick Plunket of Ardagh was one, his old pupil Oliver being his agent at Rome. In January 1609 Peter Talbot was appointed to Dublin, the sees of Cashel. Tuam, and Ossory being filled at the same Plunket should represent them at Rome, and he thus became a sort of general solicitor for Irish causes. He showed much zeal against Peter Walsh [q. v.] and his party, and was on friendly terms with his cousin, Archbishop Talbot, but was not one of those whom the latter recommended for the see of Armagh. Wood (Life, ii. 182) tells an unlikely story about an intrigue in Plunket's favour. There were objections to all the candidates named, and Clement IX out the controversy short by saying, 'Why discuss the uncertain, when the certain is before Here we have a man of approved virtue, consummate doctrine, and long experience, conspicuous for his qualifications in the full light of Rome. I make Oliver Plunket archbishop of Armagh and primate of Iroland, by my apostolic authority.' The formal nomination was on 9 July 1669, the brief dated 8 Aug., and on 80 Nov. Plunket was consecrated at Ghout by the bishop of that see, one of whose assistants was Nicholas French [q. v.] of Ferns. Plunket reached London in November, and remained there till his departure for Iroland in the early spring of 1670. The pallium, which was granted on 28 July of that year, followed him to his own country. He had been twenty-five years in Rome.

Francis Barberini was at this time cardinal-protector of Ireland, and his letters secured Plunket a good reception from Queen Catherine of Braganza. Her almoner, Philip Thomas Howard [q. v.], lodged him secretly for ten days in his own apartment at Whitehall, and showed him the town. In February 1670 Plunket left London for Holyhead, the roads being almost impassable from snow, and reached Dublin about the middle of March after a ten hours'sail. Lord Fingalland other magnates of Plunket's name offered hospitality, and he accepted that of Lord Louth, whose house was conveniently placed for his work. It appears from a letter or Lord Conway's (Rawdon Papers, letter evi.) that the king himself gave private information to John Robertes, afterwards first earl of Radnor [q. v.], the viceroy, that Plunket was lurking in Ireland; but this was before his consecration at Ghent, and it is probable that Charles ordered a search only because he knew that it would be fruitless. John, lord Berkeley of Stratton [q. v.], who succeeded Robartes as viceroy, reached Ireland in April, and from him neither Plunket nor Plunket was Talbot had anything to fear. indeed accused of accepting too many invitations to Dublin Castle, but he said that he could not decently refuse, especially as Lady Berkeley and Chief-secretary Lane were 'secretly catholics' (BRADY). He was even allowed to set up a school in Dublin under jesuit management, and he lost no opportunity of praising Berkeley's tolerance and kindness. Plunket's enemies suggested that he was on too friendly terms with his protestant rival, Primate James Margetson [q. v.], but with him it was not easy to quarrel.

Arthur Capel, earl of Essex [q. v.], succeeded Borkeley in 1672. His protestantism was undoubted, but he had probably no wish to persecute; and Plunket wrote to Oliver, the general of the jesuits, that the viceroy was a wise man, prudent and moderate, and not inferior to his predecessor in good will towards mo' (Hist. MSS. Comm. 10th Rep. App. pt. v. p. 361). His plan was to encourage dissensions among the Roman catholic clergy, and in particular the dispute concerning the precedence of their sees between Plunket and Talbot (Spicilegium Ossoriense, ii. 22; RUS-SOLT. and PRENDERGAST, Report on Carte Papers, p. 126).

Plunket's labours in his diocese were unceasing. In the first four years of his mission he confirmed 48,655 persons, some of them sixty years old, and this activity was never relaxed. His energies were not even confined to Ireland, for he visited the Hebrides in 1671, with some help from Lord Antrim, and in spite of the house of Argyll. His account of this mission is unfortunately lost. In ecclesiastical politics Plunket was an ultramontane, favouring the jesuits, scouting Peter Walsh and the opportunists, and carefully nipping Jansenism in the bud. In the interminable disputes between the Franciscan and Dominican orders he was disposed to favour the latter. The unfrocked, or at least disgraced, friars who incurred his censure and subsequently swore away his life were Franciscans. Irregularities of all kinds he sternly repressed, and he did what he could for education in the face of immense difficulties. The revenue from his see was only 621. in good years, and sometimes it fell to 51. 10s.; nor did he get much outside help. Charles II allowed him 2001. in 1671. In 1679 he wrote that he had not received quite 40% altogether from Rome, that is for his own use; but several sums passed through his hands for educational and other purposes, which were always carefully accounted for. He never had a house of his own, and was often glad to eat catcake and milk.

Plunket was not on very cordial terms with Archbishop Talbot. He presided at the national synod in Dublin in June 1670, which Talbot attended, but the ancient dispute about precedence between the two chief archiepiscopal sees was soon revived. Early in 1671 it was proposed to send the archbishop's brother Richard to England as agent at court for the Irish Roman catholics, and the archbishop subscribed 101. Plunket offered to give a like sum if the clergy of his diocese would raise it, but this they refused to do. In 1672 Plunket published a treatise in English under the title 'Jus Primatiale,' &c., in which he claimed pre-eminence for his own see. Talbot was much aggrieved, and wrote an answer in Latin, entitled 'Primatus Dublinensis,'&c., which was published at Lisle in 1674. In the established church of Ireland the supremacy of Armagh had long been fully acknowledged. Baldeschi, secretary of the propaganda, pithily pronounced that he of Armagh kept his saddle — 'L'Armacano sta a cavallo' -but the controversy was not finally settled until long afterwards. Plunket was engaged as late as 1678 on a rejoinder to Talbot's treatise, but it never saw the light.

The agitation in England which led to the passing of the Test Act, and the subsequent agitation against the Duke of York, forced the Irish government into repressive measures. Roman catholics were excluded from the corporations, while their bishops and regular clergy were ordered to leave the kingdom. At the beginning of 1074 Plunket thought it prudent to hide, and to write in the name of Thomas Cox. One Sunday in January, after vospers, he travelled through snow and hail to the house of a country gentleman whose reduced circumstances left him little to fear from the recusancy laws. After some months the persecution slackened, and on 23 Sept. he ventured to write officially in his own name to his archiepiscopal brother of Tuam, but the letter is addressed to 'Mr. James Lynch.' Archbishop Lynch was himself driven into exile, but Plunket was well thought of in high official quarters, and was not seriously molested (Memoir, p. 207). When Ormonde succeeded Essex as viceroy in 1677, there was for a while little change in Plunket's position. Titus Oates made his first depositions respecting the 'Popish Plot' in September 1678, and in October Archbishop Talbot, who had been allowed to return to Ireland, was in consequence consigned to the prison where he died. In November Plunket went to Dublin to attend the deathbed of his old master and namesake, the bishop of Meath, and on 6 Dec. he was committed to the castle.

Plunket was kept for about six weeks in the castle in solitary confinement, but nothing appeared against him, and the rule was soon relaxed. MacMoyer and his fellowperjurers, who accused Plunket of sharing in the Irish branch of the 'Popish Plot,' went over to England, and carefully rehearsed their part, returning to Iroland with instructions from the politicians who managed the plot. Special orders were sent that the prisoner should be tried by an exclusively protestant jury. Ormende had the venue faid at Dundalk at the July assizes, 1680. This was in Plunket's own diocese, where he and his accusers were equally well known, and the result was that no witnesses were forthcoming. The trial was necessarily postponed, and in October orders came that it should take place in London. There were precedents for such a course, notably that of Connor, lord Magnire [see Maguire, Connor, 1616-1645]. Plunket had nearly exhausted his slender resources by paying the exerbit ant charges of his Dublin gaoler, and was brought to London at the public expense. He arrived between 28 Oct. and 6 Nov., when the committee for examinations allowed him pen. ink, and paper. Two days later he petitioned the king and the House of Lords that he might be maintained in prison, and that his servant might be allowed across to him. Richardson, the governor of Newgato, reported a conversation in which he seemed to acknowledge that there was a plot of some kind in Ireland, but nothing was elicited from him at the bar of the lords. On 7 Jan. 1680-1 he was allowed to send to Ireland for some money of his—less than 1001.— which was in Sir Valentine Browne's hands (Hist. MSS. Comm. 11th Rep. Apr. 31 1668)

(Hist. MSS. Comm. 11th Rep. App. ii. 168). One grand jury refused to find a bill because the witnesses contradicted each other, but a second was more easily convinced, or practice may have made MacMoyer and his associates more plausible. Plunket lay in Newgate until 3 May 1681, when he was arraigned in the king's bench. He demurred to the jurisdiction, on the ground of his previous arraignment in Treland, but this was overruled, and the trial at his request was fixed for 8 June. to enable him to bring over evidence. This apparently liberal respite was useless, for the Trish courts refused to compromise their independence by forwarding records without direct orders from the crown, and the English judges refused to receive parole evidence as to previous convictions of the witnesses. There were also delays from bad roads and want of money, and Plunket had to meet the charge of high treason without witnesses and without counsel. Chief-justice Pemberton, who had just succeeded Scroggs, and who afterwards defended the seven bishops, behaved with more decency, though scarcely with more fairness, than his predecessor. The puisne judge Thomas Jones (d. 1692) [q. v.] and William Dolben (d. 1694) [q. v.] were also severe on the prisoner. Sir Robert Sawyer [q.v.] conducted the case as attorney-general, with Finch, Jollreys, and Maynard. The case against him was that he had conspired to bring a large French army to Ireland. For that purpose, it was said, he had collected money, and Carlingford was to be the place of disombarkation. As Planket pointed out, one had only to look at a map of Ireland to see that no foreign enemy would go to Carlingford. The money collected by him was for the service of his church, and he had never had any communication with the French government. Plunket freely confossed that he had done everything that an archbishop of his church was bound to do, and that there might be matter for a promunire. As for treason, the evidence, as we now road it, is so absurd that it is hard to understand his conviction by the jury after a quarter of an hour's deliberation.

After conviction Plunket solemnly said, 'I was never guilty of any of the treasons laid to my charge, as you will hear in time, and my character you may receive from my Lord-chancellor of Ireland [Michael Boyle], my Lord Berkeley, my Lord Essex, and the Duke of Ornoude.' Essex told the king that Plunket was innount, and that the evidence against him could not be true. Charles retorted that Essex might have saved him by saying this at the trial, but that he himself dared not pardon any one. Plunket was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn on I July. On the scaffold he read a dignified speech, denying what had been sworn against him, and pointing out the flaws in the evidence. A postscript was affixed, in which he declared that he had made no mental reservation or evasion, but employed words 'in their usual sense and meaning, as protestants do when they discourse with all candour and sincerity.' His dying speech was at once printed and circulated.

'Lord Essex told me,' says Burnet, 'that this Plunket was a wise and sober man... in due submission to the government, without engaging into intrigues of state... the foreman of the grand jury, who was a zealous protestant, told me, they contradicted one another evidently... he was condemned, and suffered very decently, expressing himself in many particulars as became a bishop.' Charles Fox, in his historical fragment, declared that of his 'iunocence no doubt could be entertained.' In Dalrymple's 'Memoirs' Plunket is called 'the most innocent of men.'

Extraordinary honour has been paid to Archbishop Plunket's remains. The head was sent to Cardinal Howard at Rome, and by him presented to Archbishop Hugh Mac-Mahon, who brought it to Ireland about 1722. It is still preserved in the Dominican convent at Drogheda, which was founded in that year by the archbishop's grand-niece, Catherine Plunket. Father Corker, the chief of the English Benedictines, who was in Newgate with Plunket, had the body buried first in the churchyard of St. Giles-in-the-fields; two years later it was exhumed and carried to Germany to the Benedictine Abbey of St. Adrian and St. Denis at Lamspringe, near Hildesheim, and there it remained until the Prussian government expelled the English monks in 1803. It was then placed in the churchyard, but brought to England in 1883, when it was placed in St. Gregory's monastery. Downside, near Bath. Father Corker employed a surgeon named Ridley to cut off the arms below the elbows. One of these severed limbs was long preserved at Sarnsfield Court, Herefordshire, and is now at the Franciscan convent, Taunton. When the body was removed from Lamspringe some bones were extracted and left there as rolics.

There is a portrait of Plunket in the Drogheda numery, said to have been painted in prison, 'in the dress peculiar to archbishops of that time, with long flowing hair and beard.' A portrait painted by G. Murphy is in the National Portrait Gullery, London, and has been engraved by Vander Vaart; other engravings by Luttrell, Collins, Dunbar, and Lowndes are mentioned by Bromley. Another portrait is in the Bodleian Library.

Plunket

[Cardinal Moran has collected most of the facts and many of the documents in his Memoir of Archbishop Plunket, and in his Spicilegium Os-oriense. The latter contains originals of which the former gives translations or extracts. Other letters are in De Burgo's Hibernia Dominicana, 1762, and in the 7th and 10th Reports of the Hist. MSS. Comm.; Carte's Ormonde; Stuart's Armagh; D'Alton's Hist. of Drogheda; Archbishop Hugh MacMahon's Jus Primatiale Armachanum, 1728; Peter Walsh's Hist. of the Remonstrance; State Trials, vols. ii. and iii., ed. 1742; Anthony Wood's Life and Times, ed. Clark, vol. ii.; Arthur, Earl of Essex's Letters, 1770; Brady's Episcopal Succe-sion; Macrac's Anuals of the Bodleian Library; Tablet newspaper, 10 Feb. 1883; information kindly supplied by the Rev. Robert Murphy, P.P., St. Peter's, Drogheda.]

PLUNKET, PATRICK (d. 1668), ninth BARON OF DUNSANY, co. Meath, was only son of Christopher, eighth lord Dunsany, by his wife Mary or Maud, daughter of Henry Babington of Dethick, Derbyshire. Both father and mother were Roman catholics. An ancestor, Sir Christopher Plunket (d. 1445), was active in the Irish wars during the early part of the fifteenth century, and is said to have been deputy to Sir Thomas Stanley, lord lieutenant of Ireland. His son, Sir Christopher (d. 1461), is generally reckoned first Baron Dunsany. Another Christopher Plunket was taken prisoner by the Irish in 1466, and died in 1467 (Lodge, vi. 166-74; Book of Howth, pp. 156, 172, 359; Annals of Four Masters, iv. 1043, 1049). Patrick Plunket, seventh lord Dunsany ( f. 1530), was reputed to be the author of some literary works, which have not come to light.

Patrick, the ninth lord, succeeded to the title and estates on the death of his father in 1603. He sat in the House of Lords at Dublin, and married Jane, daughter of Sir Thomas Heneage of Lincolnshire. At the commencement of the movements of 1641 in Ireland, Lord Dunsany, with other Roman catholic peers, addressed letters to the lords justices at Dublin in relation to rumoured designs against themselves and their co-religionists. In March 1641–2 Dunsany, in a letter to the Earl of Ormonde, still extant, avowed himself a loyal subject, a 'lover of the prosperity of England,' and added, 'I aman Englishman born, my mother an Englishwoman, and my wife an Englishwoman.' Later in the same month he applied Chastellux, who died on 26 Oct. 1788; she to the lords justices for assistance to enable was subsequently lady-in-waiting to the him to defend his castle and lands. His re- Duchess of Orleans, and died at Paris on quest was not acceded to, and he was soon 18 Dec. 1815. Her son Affred (born posafter committed to prison on a charge of thumously in February 1789) became an treason. After an incarceration of eighteen months he was liberated, but bound to appear for trial in the court of king's bench. Under the government of the parliament of England Dunsany and his wife were ejected from their castle and possessions, which had been decreed to 'adventurers' who had advanced money in London for estates in Treland. In the acts of settlement and explanation of 1062 a clause was inserted for restoring to Dunsary his castle, with portions of the estates which he possessed in 1641. He died in 1008.

[Carto's Life of Ormonde, 1736; Carte Papers, Bodleian Library; Peorage of Ireland, 1789; Wood's Athena Oxon. 1813; Prendergast's Cromwellian Sattlement, 1875; Gilbert's Contomporary Hist. of Affairs in Iroland, 1870, and Hist. of Confederation and War in Iroland, 1882.]

PLUNKET, THOMAS, BARON PLUNKET of the Holy Roman Empire (1716-1779), general in the service of Austria, a kinsman of Lord Dunsany, was born in Ireland in 1716. Entering the Austrian army, he fought in Turkey and in the war of the Spanish succession. In 1746, as a colonel and adjutantgeneral of the army in Italy, he much distinguished himself, and in the following yoar he was sent to Genoa as bearer of the imperial pardon to that ropublic. He wont through the seven years war. In 1757, under Daun, by capturing the obstinately defended village of Krzeszow, he greatly contributed to the victory of Kollin. The cross of the order of Maria Theresa, which conformed the title of baron, was consequently awarded him on 4 Dec. 1758. In the following year he was in command of eight Austrian regiments in Saxony (CARLYLE, Frederick the Great, viii. 177). In 1763 he was nominated general. On St. Patrick's day 1766 he attended the dinner given at Vienna tomen of Irish extraction by Count Demetrius O'Mahony, the Spanish ambassador [see under O'MAHONY, DANIEL]. In 1770 he was appointed governor of Antwerp, which post he hold till his death, 20 Jan. 1779.

By his marriage with Mary D'Alton, probably a sister of Richard and Edward D'Alton, Austrian generals, he had a son, an Austrian officer, killed at the siege of Belgrade in 1789. A daughter, Mary Bridget Charlotte Josephine, born at Louvain in 1759, was educated at the English Austin numbery, Paris, and married in 1787 the Marquis de Duchess of Orleans, and diod at Paris on equerry to Princess Adelaide, the sister of Louis-Philippe, was a deputy, 1832-42, and was created a peer of France in 1845.

[Hirtonfeld's Militär Maria Theresen Orden, Vienna, 1857; Annual Register, 1766, p. 60; Diary of Gouverneur Morris; Alger's Englishmen in French Revolution.] J. G. A. J. G. A.

PLUNKET, WILLIAM CONYNG-IIAM, first BARON PLUNKIIT (1764-1864), lord chancellor of Ireland, born at Enniskillen, co. Monaghan, on 1 July 1764, was the fourth and youngest son of Thomas Plunket, a presbyterian minister of Enniskillen, whose father also was a zealous minister of the same denomination. His mother. Mary, was daughter of Redmond Conyngham of the same town. The father, educated at Glasgow, was transferred from Enniskillen to Dublin, where he was, in 1768, appointed the colleague of the Rev. Dr. Moody in the ministry of the Strand Street Chapel. He proved an active liberal politician at Dublin, possessed of great political knowledge and conversational powers; he was a constant attendant in the gallery of the House of Commons, and a frequent adviser of the patriot In 1778 he died, leaving his members. widow ill provided for; and it was only by the support of the Strand Street congregation that she was able to bring up her chil-

William Plunket attended the school of the Roy. Lewis Korr, and became familiar with Barry Yelverton (afterwards Lord Avonmoro) through a schoolboy intimacy with his son. In 1779 he matriculated in the university of Dublin, twice took the class prize, obtained a scholarship in his third year, and joined the college historical society, where, with his friends young Yelverton and Thomas Addis Emmet [q. v.], he was a frequent speaker. Fired by the example of its members, Bushe, Magee, Parsons, and Wolfe Tone-inspired, too, by the enthusiasm of the patriotic successes of 1782-he became a leading debater, was vice-president in 1788, took the medals for oratory, history, and for composition in turn, and produced an essay in defence of the Age, which the society decided to print and rewarded with a special prize. In 1784 he graduated B.A., and having kept his terms at the king's inns while at the university, he entered Lincoln's Inn, London, and began, in lodgings at Lamboth, the diligent study of law, depending on his mother's narrow means and on the help of friends. He returned to Dublin in May 1786, was called to the bar in Hilary term 1787, and acquired a modest practice before the year was out. His rise was rapid, and gave proofs of steady industry, conspicuous logical power, and temperate habits, the last then an uncommon distinction. He practised indiscriminately in common law, equity, and criminal courts, and went the north-western circuit, which included Enniskillen. He was soon one of the leading advocates of his day, and his fame ultimately exceeded that of any Irish counsel before or since.

In 1797 Lord Clare made him a king's counsel; but until 1798 he kept aloof from politics. Nor was he professionally brought into political prominence except once, when, on 4 July 1708, he appeared with Curran to defend Henry Sheares [q. v.] on his trial for high treason (State Trials, xxvii, 255). Early in 1798 James Caulfeild, first earl of Charlemont [q. v.], offered to Plunket the seat for his family borough of Charlemont, once held by Grattan. At first the offer was refused, Plunket being for, and Charlemont against, the Roman catholic claims; but it was renewed without any pledge being attached to it, and on these terms was accepted (see HARDY, Life of Lord Charlemont, ii. 429). Plunket was elected, and devoted himself to an uncompromising and disinterested opposition to the projected Act of Union. He took his seat on 6 Feb. 1798, and during the remainder of the existence of the Irish parliament frequently spoke in debate; nor did his parliamentary fall short of his forensic reputation. He was also a contributor of witty articles to the 'Anti-Union' newspaper, begun on 27 Dec. 1798 and abandoned in March 1799. The extinction of the Irish parliament in 1800 for a time put an end to Plunket's political ambitions, and he devoted himself to his practice and to the accumulation of a fortune. He appeared for the prosecution on the trial of Robert Emmet [q. v.] in September 1803 for his rebellion (State Trials, xxviii. 1097), and is charged, unjust with having pressed with undue severity the charges and evidence against his former friend, in order to win the favour of the government (see R. Maddun, United Irishmen, 3rd ser. iii. 285, 254, and D. O. Mad-DEN, Ireland and its Rulers, pt. iii. p. 125). In fact, however, he had only known the prisoner's brother Thomas (see Plunket's affidavit, 28 Nov. 1811, in O'Flanagan's Chancellors of Ireland, ii. 472; Irish Quart. Rev. iv. 161). By the attorney-general's special request Plunket made the speech in reply. Shortly afterwards, at the end of 1803, he became solicitor-general, and was at once denounced as a renegade by the writer called 'Juverna' in Cobbett's 'Weekly Register' in terms for which, in 1804, he recovered at Westminster 5001 damages against Cobbett in an action for libel (State Triate, xxix. 53). Some years afterwards he was obliged to commence proceedings against the publishers of 'Sketches of History, Politics, and Manners in Dublin in 1810, for a gross repetition of the charge. In 1805 Pitt made him attorney-general, and he retained that office in the following whig administration. Hitherto he had treated the post as professional and non-political. Now it became a party and parliamentary one. He was invited by Lord Grenville to enter the English House of Commons, and was accordingly, though with reluctance, elected for Midhurst early in 1807. He then became an adherent of Lord Grenville, and, though he sat only for two months before the dissolution, made his mark in debate: but having identified himself with the whigs he declined the request of the new tory administration, that he should retain the attorney-generalship.

Upon the dissolution he was not re-elected to parliament, and for the next five years remained in Ireland, earning both reputation and an income probably unequalled at the Irish bar. In cross-examination he excelled; he addressed juries with marked success; but it was to chancery cases that he devoted most of his time, and in them he felt most at home. Of his methods of argument the case of Rex v. O'Grady is said to be the best example (see report by Richard Wilson Greene, publ. 1816). Despite the Duke of Bedford's offer of two successive seats in the interval, it was not until 1812 that he reentered parliament, as member for Dublin University. The government favoured a tory candidate, but his friends Burrowes and Magee secured his return. He held the seat till he retired from parliament. He was now rich, partly from his own exertions, partly from his brother Dr. Plunket's bequest to him of 60,000l. In parliament he generally supported Lord Grenville, but chiefly directed his parliamentary efforts to furthering the cause of catholic emancipation. It was on 25 Feb. 1813 that, on Grattan's motion for a committee on the laws affecting Roman catholics, he made a great speech, of which even Castlereagh declared that 'it would never be forgotten' (C. S. PARKER, Peel in Early Life, p. 75). The motion was carried, and a bill was introduced. His next great effort was, on 22 April 1814, in favour of Lord Morpeth's motion for a vote of censure on the speaker for expressions hostile to the Roman catholic claims, which he had used in the remarks he addressed to the regent at the bar of the House of Lords at the close of the previous session. The cause of emancipation, however, which had scemed hopeful in 1813, grow more and more hopeless till 1821, and Plunket, though he spoke not unfrequently, won no more oratorical victories.

Following the load of Lord Grenville, he supported the tory government both on the question of renewing the war in 1815, after Napoleon's escape from Elba, and on the course they took in 1819 with reference to the conduct of the magistrates in dealing with the meeting at St. Peter's Fields, Manchester. On the latter occasion, on the introduction of the Seditions Meetings Provention Bill, he delivered a speech which satisfied his opponents (see Quarterly Review, xxii. 407, and Lord Dudlox, Letters to the Bishop of Llandaff, p. 232) and offended his friends. Brougham upbraided him for his vote, and Lord Grey was reported to have called him an 'apostate.' Time, however, healed this broach. When Grattan died in 1820, Plunket, who had always felt and shown admiration and respect for him, succeeded to his position as foremost champion of the Roman catholic claims. It is, however, to be observed that the leaders of the Roman catholic party, while recognising that he was incomparably their best advocate, dissented from his view, which he embodied in his bill, that securities in the shape of a royal 'veto' on the appointment of catholic bishops were required (Fixz-PATRICK, O'Connell Correspondence, i. 68; Life of Dr. Doyle, i. 156). On 28 Feb. 1821 he reintroduced the question in a speech of which Peel said, twenty years later, 'It stands nearly the highest in point of ability of any ever heard in this house. It is one of the very few speeches he revised, often as he was urged to collect them; and it appeared in Butler's 'Tlistorical Memoirs of the English, Irish, and Scotch Catholics' in 1822. He saw his emancipation bill safe through its second roading on 16 March by 254 to 243 votes, and then left its conduct to Sir John Newport; it failed to become law. His wife's death recalled him to Ireland, and so paralysed his energies that he withdraw for some time from public and professional life. He returned to it when, early in January 1822, he was appointed by Lord Liverpool attorney-general for Ireland under the new lord lieutenant, the Marquis Wellesley, and was sworn of the privy council.

Hopes were held out to him and to the other Grenville whigs that something would now be done for the Roman catholics. He believed that their cause would progress more surely with friends in the administration than if its supporters remained permanently in opposition. His situation was difficult. The Trish part of the administration had been expressly constructed on the principle of a combination of opposites; for (foulburn, the chief secretary, was anti-catholic, O'Connell and his party were pressing for what was impracticable, and the protestant party endeavoured to thwart such efforts as could be made. On the whole, Plunket discharged his duties with courage and fairness. When the grand jury of Dublin threw out the bills against the ringleaders of the Bottle Riot, he exhibited ev officio informations against them, but failed to obtain convictions. Saurin then accused him of having resorted to an unconstitutional procedure, and instigated Brownlow, member for Armagh, to move a vote of consure upon him in the House of Commons. He rose in a house predisposed against him, and in a powerful speech refuted the charge (for details see WALFOLE, Hist. Engl. vol. ii.; Hansard, new sor. vols. viii. and ix.; BUCKINGHAM, Memoirs of the Court of George IV, pp. 424-6). But his difficulties in Iroland were incommat. He failed in his proscention of O'Connell in 1824 for his 'Bolivar' speech. The rise of the Oatholic Association compelled the introduction of a bill for its suppression in February 1825, which he supported; and though his speech in support of Burdett's Catholic Relief Bill on 28 Feb. was one of his finest, still the bill seemed as far as over from passing into law.

On Lord Liverpool's resignation in March 1827 and Canning's assumption of office, Plunkot expected to become Irish lord chancellor. The king's filial consciontionsness on the catholic question and dislike of advocates of catholic claims disappointed him of the office. George IV refused to accept Lord Manners's resignation of the trish chancellorship. Canning then offered Plunket the English mastership of the rolls, just vacated by Copley, which Plunket accepted, hold for a few days, and then resigned, owing to the professional feeling of the English bar against the appointment of an Irish barrister to an English judicial post. Lord Norbury was thereupon induced to resign the chief-justiceship of the Irish common pleas, and Plunket succooded him, and was raised to the peerage of the United Kingdom as Baron Plunket of Nowton, co. Oork. His first speech in the House of Lords was made on 9 June 1827, on the Catholic Relief Bill, the approaching success of which was now almost assured; and when it passed, in 1829, it was felt that no protestant had done more for it than he.

Politically his work was now almost done, though in later years he voted and not unfrequently spoke on Irish questions. On 23 Dec. 1830 he was appointed by Lord | the last moment the preparation of his cases. Grey lord chancellor of Ireland. The change A deep-read lawyer he was not, but he had was not popular with the bar, as his reputatation in the common pleas was that of a hasty and imprudent judge (Greville Me-moirs, 1st ser. ii. 91). Politically his influence was still great, and his advice was highly esteemed by successive lord lieutenants. Lords Anglesea, Wellesley, and Mulgrave; and in 1839 he made a powerful defence of Mulgrave's administration in the House of Lords. As a judge he proved himself patient, bold, and acute; and whatever may be said of his deficiency in learning-and his decisions certainly were frequently reversed on appeal—his practical efficiency is not to be gainsaid. The numerous legal appointments he from time to time bestowed on his relatives excited comment, and even scandal (see Hansard, x. 1219). Early in 1839 a report was put about that he was to be replaced by Sir John Campbell (see, for example, Firz-PATRICK, Correspondence of O'Comiell, ii. 175), and overtures were made to him to lend himself to the job. He refused. It is alleged in Lord Campbell's 'Life' (ii. 142) that he gave a written undertaking in 1840 to resign whenever required; but of this statement there seems to be no confirmation. Lord Melbourne sounded him again in June 1841, without result. The lord lieutenant then asked for his concurrence as a personal favour to himself, and on 17 June Plunket yielded and resigned. Plunket bore this ill-treatment, which Lord Brougham (see preface to D. PLUNKET, Life of Lord Plunket) has stigmatised as gross, and public opinion has over since considered unjustifiable (Greville Memoirs, 2nd ser. ii. 14), with dignified and uncomplaining silence. He retired altogother from politics, travelled in Italy, and lived a peaceful country life at his seat, Old Connaught, co. Wicklow. At last his mental faculties failed, and he died on 4 Jan. 1854, and was buried in Mount Jerome cemetery, In 1791 he married Catherine, daughter of John McCausland of Strabane, then M.P. for Donegal. He left six sons and five daughters, and was succeeded in the title by his oldest son, the Right Hon. Thomas Spen Plunket, D.D., who was in 1839 appointed bishop of Tuam, Killala, and Actionry, and who died 19 Oct. 1866.

Plunket was in person tall and robust, the Orange party.

with a harsh but expressive countenance; in manner cold to strangers, though he was a devoted husband and a constant friend. He was of great physical strength and a keen sportsman, but indolent—rising late, hating to put pen to paper, and leaving till a tenacious grasp of principle, a masculine power of reasoning, a ready apprehension, and a persuasive and lofty mode of address. His reputation for bright and instant wit stood high. His parliamentary eloquence was in its kind unsurpassed. Conviction rather than passion, close and comprehensive reasoning rather than appeals to sentiment, a lofty range of thought and a copious and polished expression, were its leading characteristics. As Sheil said (Hansard, xevi. 273): 'Plunket convinced, Brougham surprised, Canning charmed, Peel instructed, Russell exalted and improved.' As a statesman his fame rests on his service to catholic emancipation. There is a bust of him by Charles Moore, engraved in his grandson's 'Life' of him. An engraving by S. Cousins, from a portrait by Rothwell, is in the National Portrait Gallery, Dublin.

Hon. D. Plunket's Life of Lord Plunket; O'Flanagan's Irish Chancellors, ii. 405; Dublin Univ. Mag. xv. 262; Legal Review, xxii. 233. For a detailed appreciation of his eloquence at the bar see R. L. Sheil's Sketches of the Irish Bar, W. H. Curran's Sketches of the Irish Bar. and in parliament Lord Brougham's Preface to D. Plunket's Life of Lord Plunket; Early Sketches of Eminent Persons, by Chief-justice Whiteside, p. 157; Croker Papers, i. 230; Ann. Reg. 1851 : Lockhart's Scott, vi. 57.7 J. A. H.

PLUNKETT, Mrs. ELIZABETH (1769-1823), translator. [See under GUNNING, Mrs. Susannah.]

PLUNKETT, JOHN HUBERT (1802-1869), Australian statesman, was the younger of the twin sons of Georg Plunkett of Roscommon and Miss O'Ke ly of Tycooly, co. Galway. Born at Roscommon in June 1802, he was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated B.A. with some distinction in 1824. He was called to the Irish bar in 1826, and joined the Connaught circuit. He soon threw himself vigorously into politics; and, as a catholic whose family properties had been confiscated under penal laws, he earnestly advocated the catholic emancipation. To him was largely due the return to parliament of O'Connell's sup-porters, French and the O'Conor Don, for Roscommon in 1830—an admitted blow to

In October 1831, though his prospects at 1611 the Earl of Kent, with the consent the bar were encouraging, he accepted from Earl Grey the post of solicitor-general of New South Wales. In 1830 he combined the office with that of attornoy-general. He had a seat ex officio in the old logislative council. In 1848 he became, in addition, chairman of the newly established National School Board.

In 1856, when responsible government was concoded to New South Wales, Plunkett resigned office and retired on a pension, but immediately stood for election to the new assembly, and was elected for two out of three constituencies where he was nomi-Sydney alono rejected him. elected to sit for Argyle; but next year he resigned, and was appointed to the upper chamber, where he was elected president. In 1858, owing to a collision with the prime minister, Charles Cowper, his name was removed from the committee of education, and he temporarily retired from public life; but in 1868 he joined the Martin ministry as leader in the upper chamber. In 1865, owing to the mediation of friends, he joined the Cowper ministry as attornoy-general, and remained in office till the ministry foll. During his later life Plunket tlived chiefly in Melbourne, staying in Sydney during the session of parliament. He died on 9 May 1869 at Burlington Terrace, Rast Melbourne. A public funeral at Sydney was accorded him on 15 May.

Plunkett was a zealous Roman catholic, and in his last years was secretary to the provincial council of the Roman catholic church at Melbourne. He was a vice-prosident of Sydney University.

[Sydney Morning Herald, 11 May 1869; Heaton's Australian Dates; Monnell's Australagian Biography.] C. A. 11.

PLYMOUTH, FARLS OF. [See FITZ-CHARLES, CHARLES, 1057 P-1080; WINDSOR, THOMAS WINDSOR, first Earl of the second creation, 1027 ?-1087.]

POCAHONTAS, afterwards Rolen, Ru-BUGGA (1595-1617), American-Indian prin-(See under Rolle, John, 1585-1622.)

POCKLINGTON, JOHN, D.D. (d. 1042), divine, received his education at Sidney (Jolloge, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1598. He was admitted a fellow of his college on the Blundell foundation in 1600, commenced M.A. in 1009, and proceeded to the degree of B.D. in 1610. While at Cambridge he hold extremely high-church views. In January 1610 he was presented to the vicarage of Bahorgh, Suffolk. On 15 May of Lord Harington, wrote to Sidney College to dispense with Pocklington's holding a small living with cure of souls (Addit. M.S. 5847, f. 207). On 13 Jan. 1612 he was elected to a fellowship at Pembroke College, Cambridge, which he resigned in 1618. He was created D.D. in 1621. He became rector of Yelden, Bedfordshire, vicar of Waresley, Huntingdonshire, and one of the chaplains to Charles L.

On 31 Oct. 1628 he was collated to the fourth stall in Peterborough cathedral, and on 25 Nov. 1626 to the prebend of Langford Ecclosia in the church of Lincoln. He was also appointed chaplain to the bishop of Lincoln. Soon afterwards he published 'Sunday no Sabbath. A Sermon preached before the Lord Bishop of Lincolne at his Lordships Visitation at Ampthill . . Aug. 17, 1635, London (two editions), 1636, 4to. This was followed by 'Altare Christianum; or the dead Vicars Plea. Wherein the Vicar of Grantham], being dead, yet speaketh, and pleadeth out of Antiquity against him that hath broken downe his Altar, London, 1637, 4to. The arguments advanced in the latter work were answered in 'A Quench-Coale,' 1637. Pockling on was appointed a canon of the collegiate chapel of Windsor by patent on 18 Dec. 1039, and installed on 5 Jan. 1039 -1010. On 14 Sept. 1610 he was at York, and wrote a long letter to Sir John Lombe. describing the movements of the royal army (Dom., Car. 1, vol. cecelxvii. No. 61).

Among the king's pamphlets in the British Museum is 'The Polition and Articles exhibited in Parliament against John Pocklington, D.D., Parson of Yelden, Bedfordshire, Anno 1641, London, 1641, 4to; reprinted in Howell's 'State Trials' (v. 747). He was charged with being 'a chief author and ringleader in all those [ritualistic] innovations which have of late flowed into the Church of England.' On 12 Feb. 1640-1 he was sentenced by the House of Lords never to come within the verge of the court, to be deprived of all his proferments, and to have his two books, 'Altare Christianum' and 'Sunday no Sabbath, publicly burnt in the city of London and in each of the universities by the hand of the common executioner. When Pocklington was deprived of his preferments, William Bray, D.D., who had licensod his works, was onjoined to preach arecantation sermon in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster (HEYEAN, Life of Land, p. 441). Pocklington died on 14 Nov. 1642, and was buried on the 16th in the precincts of Peterborough cathedral.  $oldsymbol{\Lambda}$  copy of Pocklington's will in the British is dated 6 Sept. 1642; in it bequests are made to his daughters Margaret and Elizabeth, and his sons John and Oliver. His wife Anne (who died in 1655) was made sole executrix. He ordered his body 'to be buried in Monks' churchyard, at the foot of those monks' martyrs whose monument is well known.'

Museum (Lansdowne MS, 990, art. 20, f. 74)

[Information from J. W. Clark, esq.; Addit. MSS. 5852 f. 214, 5878 f. 77; Bridges's Northamptonshire, ii. 566; Fuller's Appeal of Injured Innocence, pt. iii. pp. 45, 46; Hawes's Hist. of Framlingham (Loder), p. 247; Heylyn's Life of Laud, pp. 295, 313; Le Neve's Fasti (Hardy), ii. 165, 548, iii. 402; Lysons's Bedfordshire, p. 156; Notas and Queries, 1st ser. viii. 215, ix. 247, x. 37; Prynne's Canterburies Doome, pp. 186, 190, 221, 357, 358, 513, 516; Prynne's Hidden Works of Darkness, p. 179; Quench-Coale, pref. p. xxxii, pp. 294, 312; Richardson's Athenæ Cantabr. MS. p. 123; Cal. of State Papers, Dom. 1634-5 p. 346, 1637 p. 551, 1638-1639 p. 534, 1639-40 pp. 168, 203, 520, 1640-1641 pp. 61, 355; Walker's Suffering-, i. 55, ii. 95; Willis's Survey of Cathedrals, iii. 521; Wood's Fasti Oxon. (Bliss), i. 301.] T. C.

POCKRICH, POKERIDGE, or PUCK-ERIDGE, RICHARD (1690?-1759), inventor of the musical glasses, was born in co. Monaghan, and was descended from an English family which had left Surrey and settled in Ireland in the seventeenth century. His father was a soldier who had raised a company of his own, and was dangerously wounded at the siege of Athlone. Richard was left at the ago of twenty-five an unencumbered fortune of 4,000l. a year (PIL-KINGTON, Memoirs), but all his resources he dissipated in the pursuit of visionary projects. He proposed to plant vineyards in reclaimed Irish bogs, to supply men-of-war with tin boats which would not sink, to secure immortality by the transfusion of blood, and to provide human beings with wings. He also bought some thousands of acres of poor land in Wicklow, and started the breeding of geese on a large scale, and was for a time proprietor of a brewery. After all his schemes had come to grief he endeavoured, without success, to obtain the post of chapel-master at Armagh. On 23 April 1745 he married Mrs. Margaret Winter, widow of a Francis Winter, with an income of 2001, a year, and in the same year made an unsuccessful endeavour to enter parliament as M.P. for co. Monaghan. In 1749 he failed again as a candidate for Dublin (Newburgh, Essays, &c., р. 237). Pockrich, who was 'a perfect master of music,' was the inventor of the musical glasses, by which music was produced by striking harmonically arranged goblets of glass. The invention was developed in the harmonica. Pockrich also invented a new form of dulcimer. In later life he gave concerts in various parts of England, at which practical exhibitions of his musical glasses were given. He engaged John Carteret Pilkington, son of Mrs. Letitia Pilkington [q.v.], to sing for him, and composed many pieces of music himself. In 1756 he published a volume of 'Miscellaneous Works,' comprising poems and songs. Brockhill Newburgh of co. Cavan described his eccentricities and schemes in a poem entitled 'The Projector.' 'A tall, middle-aged gentleman, usually wearing a bag-wig and sword, he was suffocated to death in 1759 in a fire which broke out in his room at Hamlin's Coffee-house, Sweeting's Alley, near the Royal Exchange, London. Pockrich's wife seems to have formed a liaison with Theophilus Cibber [q.v.], and was drowned with that author in a shipwreck off the Scotch coast in 1758.

[Memoirs of John Carteret Pilkington; Brockhill Newburgh's Essays, Poetical, Moral, &c. 1769; Campbell's Philosophical Survey; Conran's National Music of Ireland; Gent. Mag. 1759; O'Donoghue's Poets of Ireland, p. 206.]

INDEX

TO

THE FIFTEENTH VOLUME.

PA	n i	PA	GE.
Owens, John (1790-1846)	ī	Pack, George (fl. 1700-1724)	26
Owens, John Lonnergen (fl. 1780).	2	Pack, Richardson (1082-1728)	27
Owens, Owon (d. 1508). See under Owen,	- 1	Packe, Sir Christopher (1598?–1682)	28
John (1580–1651).	1	Packe, Christopher (jl. 1711)	80
Owenson, Robert (1744-1812)	2	Packe, Christopher, M.D (1696-1749)	80
Owenson, Miss Sydney (1788?-1859). See	~ }	Packe or Pack, Christopher (fl. 1796)	81
Morgan, Sydney, Lady.	- 1	Packe, Edmund (fl. 1785). See under Packe,	-
Owtram, William, D.D. (1626-1679) .	2	Christopher (fl. 1711).
Owtred (1815?-1896). See Uhtred.	- 1	Packer, John (1570?-1649)	81
	8	Packer, John Hayman (1780–1806)	92
Oxberry, William (1784-1821)	5	Packer, William (f. 1644-1660)	88
Oxberry, William Henry (1808-1852)	6	Packington. See Pakington.	00
Oxburgh, Honry (d. 1716)	7		34
Oxenbridge, John (1608-1674)	ó	Padarn (fl. 550)	84
Oxonden, Ashton (1808–1802).			95
Oxenden, Sir George (1620–1660)		Paddy, Sir William, M.D. (1551-1684)	90
Oxenden, George (1051-1703).		Padrig (878-468). See Patrick.	86
Oxenden, Sir George (1694-1775). See under		Padua, John of (fl. 1542-1549)	36
Oxendon, George.		Pagan, Isobel (d. 1821)
Oxenden or Oxinden, Henry (1609-1670)		Pagan, James (1811-1870)	36
Oxenedes or Oxnead, John do (d. 1298?)		Paganel, Adam (fl. 1210). See under Paganel,
Oxenford, John (1812–1877)		Ralph.
Oxenham, Henry Nutcombe (1829-1888)		Paganel, Fulk (d. 1182). See under Paganel,
Oxenham, John (d. 1575)		Ralph.
Oxford, Earls of. See Vere, Robert de, third		Paganel, Fulk ( $d$ . 1210?). See under Paganel,
Mari of the first erection, 1170?-1221;		Ralph.
Vere, John de, seventh Earl, 1818-1860;		Paganel, Ralph (fl. 1089)	87
Vere, Robert de, minth Earl, 1862-1892;		Paganel, William (fl. 1186?). See under
Vore, Aubrey de, tenth Earl, 1840?-1400;		Paganel, Ralph.
Vore, John de, thirteenth Earl, 1448-1518;		Paganell or Painel, Gervasa (fl. 1189)	88
Voro, John de, sixteenth Earl, 1512?-		Page, Benjamin William (1765-1815)	88
1502; Vero, Edward de, seventeenth Earl,		Page, David (1811-1870).	89
1550-1604; Vere, Henry de, eighteenth		Page, Sir Francis (1661?-1741)	89
1550-1604; Vere, Henry de, eighteenth Earl, 1508-1625; Vere, Aubrey de, twen-		Page, Frederick (1769-1884)	41
tioth Earl, 1626-1703; Harley, Robert,		Page, John (1760?-1812)	41
first Barl of the second creation, 1661-		Page, Samuel (1574-1630)	42
1721; Harley, Edward, second Earl, 1680-		Page, Thomas (1803-1877)	42
174].		Page, Sir Thomas Hyde (1746–1821)	48
Oxford, John of (d. 1200)	15	Page. William (1590–1665)	44
Oxinden, Henry (1009-1070). See Oxenden,		Pageham or Pagham, John do (d. 1158)	45
Oxloe, John (1770-1854)	17	Paget, Lord Alfred Henry (1815-1888). See
Oxley, John (1781–1828)	18	under Paget, Henry William, first Marquis
Oxioy, John (1701-1020)	19
Oxley, Joseph (1715-1775) Oxneyd, John of (d. 1293?). See Oxenedes.		Paget, Sir Arthur (1771–1840)	48
		Paget, Charles (d. 1612)	46
Oyley, Sea D'Oyley.	19		41
Ozell, John (d. 1748)	~~	Paget, Lord Clarenco Edward (1811-1895)
		See under Paget, Henry William, first Mar-
m or revot 0 sarm) Gas Dana		quis of Anglessy.
Pasty, Simon (1505 ?-1047). See Pass.	21		49
Pabo (A. 520?)	21		6
Pago, John (1528?-1590?)	0.0
Paga, Richard (1482 7-1586)	22	(1010_1990)	Ð.
Page, Thomas (d. 1588). See Brovington.			5
Pacifico, David (1784-1854)	84		5
Taule Hir Danis (1779?-1828).	25	Lugar, manich inter trans or overwholes (m. 1140)	•

PAGL		-
Paget, Henry, second Earl of Uxbridge (1719-	Palliser, Sir William (1880–1882)	Ł
1700). See under Paget, Honry, first Earl	Palliver, Wray Richard Gledstanes (d. 1891)	17 of Uxbridgo.	See under Pallisor, Sir William.
Paget, Henry William, first Marquis of Angle-	Palmarius, Thomas (ft. 1410). See Palmer. Palmer, Alicia Tindal (ft. 1810) Palmer, Anthony (1618?—1679) Palmor, Anthony (ft. 1698). See under Palmer, Anthony (ft. 1698). See under Palmer, Anthony (ft. 1678?—1679). Palmer, Anthony (ft. 1678?—1679).
soy (1768-1854)	Palmer, Alicia Tindal (fl. 1810)
Paget, John (d. 1010)	Palmer, Anthony (1618?-1679)
Paget, John (1808-1892)	Palmer, Anthony (d. 1608) See under Pal.	19
Pagel, Nathan, M.D. (1615-1679) 59	mer, Anthony (1618 ?-1079).
Paget, Nathan, M.D. (1615–1679)	Palmer, Anthony (1675?-1740) Palmer, Barbara, Countess of Cavilemaine and
Paget, Thomas (d. 1660). See under Paget,	Palmer, Barbara, Countess of Caytlemains and	40
John (d. 1640).
Paget, Thomas Cateslay, Lord Paget (d. 1742).	Villiers.
Bee under Paget, Henry, first Earl of Ux-	170-1 bridge.	Palmer, John (1742-1811). See under Palmer, John (1742-1818).
Paget, William, first Baron Paget of Beau-	Palmer Charles John (1906-1900)
desort (1505-1568)
Paget, William, fourth Baron Paget (1572-	Palmer, Edward (M. 1579)
1629)	Dalmon Regrand Houses (1040 1000)
Paget, Sir William, fifth Daron Paget (1600-1878) , , , , , , , , , , , , ,	Dalmon Cin Conffront (Trop sono)
1878) Pagot, William, sixth Baron Pagot (1687— 1718) 68	Dalmon (lasses /1000 1000)
1718)		47
Pagit or Pagitt, Ephraim (1575 ?-1047)	Palmer, Sir Honry (d. 1559). See under Palmer, Sir Thomas (d. 1558).
Pagit, Eusebius (1547?-1617)	Dalman Cir Hanna / July	١.
Pagula, William (d. 1850?)	Dalman TI   Grant 13000 3000
Pagula, William (d. 1850?)	The last and TT - 3 1 (1004 10 (8)
Pain, George Richard (1708?-1888). Sec
Pain, George Richard (1708?-1888). Sec under Pain, James.	The target of the control of the con
Pain, James (1770 ?-1877)	I to the secretary the decision of the secretary that the secretary th
	Palmer, 51r James Proderick (1804–1871) . 18
Pain, William (1780?-1790?) 67 Paine. See also Pain and Payne.	Palmer, John (d. 1607) Palmer, John (d. 1614). Soo under Palmer,	14
Paine or Payne, James (1725–1789) 67	John (d. 1607).
73.7. T (1 1000 0)	1 11-1 T-1 /10F0 1700 01
Paine, Thomas (4, 1829 7)	Palmer, John (1000-1700 ?) Palmer, John, the older (d. 1768), known as	14
Painter, Edward (1784–1862)	'Gontloman l'almor.' See under Palmer,
Painter, William (1540?-1594) 80	John (1742 ?-1708).
	Delman John /17/0-1790)
	Palmer, John (1712–1786)
Paisley, first Baron. See Hamilton, Claud (1548 ?-1022).
Pakeman, Thomas (1614 ?-1691) 82	Palmer, John (1742 7-1798)
Pakenham, Sir Edward Michael (1778–1815). 88
Pakenham, Sir Hercules Robert (1781–1850). 84	Palmer, John (fl. 1818)
Pakenham, Sir Richard (1707–1808) 85	Palmer, John Horsley (1779–1858)
Pakenham, Sir Thomas (1757–1896)	Palmer, formerly Budworth, Joseph (1756-	**
Pakenham, Sir Thomas (1757–1886)       . 85         Pakington, Dorothy, Lady (d. 1679)       . 86         Pakington, Sir John (d. 1500)       . 88	1815)
Pakington, Sir John (d. 1500)	Doloroù Inlina (d. 1650)
Pakington, John (1600–1624). See under
Pakington, John (1600–1624). See under Pakington, Sir John (1649–1626).	Palmer, Mrs. Mary (1710–1704)
Pakington, Sir John (1549–1625)	Polmer, Richard, M.D. (d. 1625)
Pakington, Sir John (1549–1625)	Palmer, Robert (1757-1805?). See under	10
Pakington, Sir John (1049–1088). See under	Palmer, John (1742?-1798).
	Palmer, Roger, Mari of Castlemaine (1694-
Pakington, Sir John (1620–1680). Pakington, Sir John (1671–1727) 91		48
Pakington, Sir John (1671–1727) . 91 Pakington, John Somerset, first Baron Hamp-	1705)   Palmer, Roundell, first Barl of Selborne (1812-	14
ton (1799–1880)		6 0
Pakington, William (d. 1890)		54
Pakington, William (d. 1890)		55
Palairet, John (1097–1774)	Palmor, Samuel (1741–1818)	58
Palavioino, Sir Horatio (d. 1600) 97		57
		59
		80
		60
Dolmon Cin Theorem /1700 1001 \		61
Palgrave, William Gifford (1826–1888) 109	Polyner Phones (# 1844-1888)	88
Palin, William (1808–1882)	Palmer Thomas Probe (1747-1960)	62
Palk, Sir Robert (1717–1798)	Dolmon William (1590 9_1605)   1	64
Polladius (A. 481?)	Palman William (1801-1881)	85
Pallady, Richard (fl. 1588-1555)	Polynor William (1909-1969)	66
Pallisor, Fanny Bury (1805–1878)	Polmor William (1811-1870) 1/	67
Falgrave, Sir Francis 1765-1601,	Palmor William (1808_1898)	68
Palliser, John (1807–1887)	Palmoranna or Palmoraton Thomas (4. 1806.	-
Palliser, John (1807–1887)	Palmer, Sir Thomas (16-10-1026)   14   Palmer, Thomas (f. 1644-1666)   14   Palmer, Thomas Bysha (1747-1802)   14   Palmer, William (1589 ?-1605)   15   Palmer, William (1892-1866)   16   Palmer, William (1892-1866)   17   Palmer, William (1802-1866)   17   Palmer, William (1804-1866)   18   P
	; =\ruse_; =\ruse_

PAGL	PAGE
Palmerston, Viscounts. See Temple, Henry, first Viscount, 1678 ?-1757; Tomple, Henry, hrat viscount, 1010 (21/07, 10mple, fienry,	Paris, Matthew (d 1250)
second Viscount, 1789-1802; Temple, Henry	Parish, Sir Woodbine (1796–16°2
John, third Viscount, 1784-1865.	Parish-Alvars, Eh or Elias (1805-1849)
Palmes, Sir Bryan (1599-1654)	Park, Andrew (1807–1863)
n-1-crosso John (d. 1664) 170	Park. Henry (1745-1881)
Paltock, Robert (1697–1767)	Park or Parkes, James (1630-1696)
Paman, Henry, M.D. (1626-1695) 178
Paman, Henry, M.D. (1826-1895) 178	Park, Sir James Alan (1768–1838)
Panduli (d. 1226)	Park, John (1804–1805)
Panifer. 500 Fauter.	Park, John James (1795–1883)
Panizzi, Sir Anthony (1797–1879)	Park, John Ranicar (1778–1847)
Panke, John (fl. 1608)	Park, Mungo (1771–1806)
Panmure, Early of. See Maule, Patrick, first	Park, Patric (1811-1855)
Pallinting, Marie Von Tomas, family Parl
Earl, d. 1061; Maulo, James, fourth Earl,	Park, Thomas (1759–1834)
1659?-1728; Maule, Harry, titular Earl,	Parke, Daniel (1669–1710)
d 1734.	Parke, Henry (1792?-1885)
Denmura, Barons, See Maule, William Ram-	Parke, Sir James, Baron Wensleydale (1782-say, first Baron Panmure of Brochin and	1868)
ally, miss Doron I ministro of Diocenia total	Parke, John (1745-1829)
Navar, Forfarshire, 1771-1852; Maule,
Fox, second Baron Panmure (of the United	Parke, Maria Hester, afterwards Beardmore
Kingdom), and eventually eleventh Earl of	i (1775–1822). See under Parke, John.
Dalhousie (in the peerage of Scotland),	Parke, Robert (ft. 1598)
	Parke, Robert (1600-1668)
1801-1874.	Parke, Robert (fl. 1800)
Panmure, Lord of. See Valognes, Philip de	Dealer (10. 1000)
(d. 1215).	Parke, Robert (1600–1668)
Panter, David (d. 1558)	Parke, William Thomas (1762-1647) 200
Panter, Panniter, or Panther, Patrick (1470 ?-	Parker, Alexander (1623-1689)
	Parker, Benjamin (d. 1747)
1519)	Parker, Charles (1800-1881)
Panton, Paul (1781-1797)
Panton, Thomas (d. 1685)	Parker, Christopher (1761-1801). See under Panton, Thomas (1781-1808)
Partialf, Trugh (d. 1924?)	Parker, Edmund, second Earl of Morley (1810-
Panton, Thomas (d. 1985)	1864). See under Parker, John, second FULDRICATION (W. TI. O. I). Bee nuder I support of Baron Boringdon and first Earl of Morley.
Pantulf, Robert : fl. 1180). See under Pantulf	Parker, Emma (fl. 1811)
Pantulf, Robert . A. 1190). See under Pantulf or Pantolium, William.	Parker, George (1651-1748)
Pantuli or Pantolium, William (d. 1112?) . 186	Parker, George, second Earl of Macelesfield (1897–1704)
Pantulf, William (d. 1288). See under	(1697–1704)
Pillouit, William (to Labo). Doc ander	Parker George (1782-1800)
Pantulf, Hugh.	Parker, George (1782–1800)
Paoli, Pascal (1725-1807)	Parker, Sir George (d. 1857)
Papillon, David (1581-1655?)
Papillon, Philip (1620-1641). See under	Parker, George Lane (1724-1791). See under
Papillon, Thomas.	Parker, George, second Earl of Macclesheld.
Papillon, Thomas (1028–1702) , , 190	Parker, Henry (d. 1470)
Papillon, Thomas (1028-1702)	Parker, Henry, eighth Baron Morley (1478-
Papilon or Papylion, Ralph, called de Arundel
(d. 1228) 192	1556) T
Papin, Denis (1047–1712?)	Parker, Henry, ninth Baron Morley (d. 1577).
Parin Tenns (1657-1700). See under Papin.	See under Parker, Henry, eighth Baron
Topic and and and and Denis. Papineau, Louis Joseph (1786–1871) 198	Morley.
	Morley. Parker, Henry (1604–1652) 24
11 Talan (1000 1000) 101	Parker, Henry (1604-1652) 24
Panworth, Edgar George (1809-1880)	Parker, Henry (1604–1652)
Papworth, Edgar George (1809–1860)	Parker, Henry (1604–1652)
Papworth, Edgar George (1809–1860)	Parker, Henry (1804-1852) . 24   Parker, Henry Perlee (1705-1878) . 24   Parker, Sir Henry Watson (1808-1881) . 24   Parker, Sir Hyde (1714-1782) . 24
Papworth, Edgar George (1809–1860)	Parker, Henry (1804–1852) . 24   Parker, Henry Perlee (1795–1878) . 24   Parker, Sir Henry Watson (1808–1881) . 24   Parker, Sir Hyde (1714–1782) . 24   Parker, Sir Hyde (1739–1807) . 24
Papworth, Edgar George (1809–1860)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar George (1809–1860)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar George (1809–1860)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar George (1809–1860)	Parker, Henry (1804-1852)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809–1880)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652) . 24/ 24 Parker, Henry Perlee (1705-1878) . 24/ 25 Parker, Sir Henry Watson (1808-1881) . 24/ Parker, Sir Hyde (1714-1782) . 24/ Parker, Sir Hyde (1739-1807) . 24/ Parker, Hyde (1789-1807) . 24/ Parker, James (1750-1805) . 34/ Parker, Sir James (1808-1652) . 24/ Parker, Sir James (1808-1652) . 24/
Papworth, Edgar George (1891–1869) Papworth, George (1781–1865) Papworth, John, atherwards John Buonarroti (1775–1847) Papworth, John Thomas (1809–1841). See under Papworth, George. Papworth, John Woody (1820–1870) Papworth, Wystt Angelious Van Sandau (1899–1894)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar George (1891–1869) Papworth, George (1781–1865) Papworth, John, atherwards John Buonarroti (1775–1847) Papworth, John Thomas (1809–1841). See under Papworth, George. Papworth, John Woody (1820–1870) Papworth, Wystt Angelious Van Sandau (1899–1894)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809–1800) Papworth, Georgo (1781–1855) Papworth, John, atherwards John Buonarroti (1775–1847) Papworth, John Thomas (1809–1841). See under Papworth, George. Papworth, John Woody (1820–1870) Papworth, John Woody (1820–1870) Papworth, Wystt Angelious Van Sandau (1822–1894) Paradiso, John (1748–1795)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar George (1809-1860)  Papworth, George (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, atterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841).  See under Papworth, George.  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wysit Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Paradiso, John (1748-1795)  Pardoe, Julia (1806-1802)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809-1809)  Papworth, Georgo (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, atterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841). See under Papworth, George.  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyatt Angelious Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Paradaso, John (1748-1795)  Pardoo, Julia (1809-1802)  Pardoo, William (d. 1092)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar George (1809-1809)  Papworth, George (1781-1855)  198  Papworth, John, atterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841). See under Papworth, George.  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyath Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Pardiso, John (1748-1795)  Pardon, Julia (1806-1802)  Pardon, William (d. 1892)  Pardon, George Frederick (1824-1884)  200	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809–1809) 198 Papworth, George (1781–1865) 198 Papworth, John, afterwards John Buonarroti (1775–1847) 190 Papworth, John Thomas (1809–1841) See under Papworth, George. Papworth, John Woody (1820–1870) 198 Papworth, Wyatt Angelicus Van Sandau (1822–1894) 194 Paradiso, John (1748–1795) 200 Pardoo, Julia (1806–1802) 200 Pardoo, William (d. 1892) 200 Pardon, George Frederick (1824–1884) 200 Pardon, George Frederick (1824–1884) 200 Pardon, William (1806–1878) 200	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809-1809)  Papworth, Georgo (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, atterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841). See under Papworth, George.  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyatt Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Paradaso, John (1748-1795)  Pardoo, Julia (1809-1802)  Pardoo, William (d. 1092)  Pardon, George Frederick (1824-1884)  Para, William (1806-1878)  Paran, Fistenne (1801-1874)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809-1809)  Papworth, Georgo (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, atterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841). See under Papworth, George.  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyatt Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Paradaso, John (1748-1795)  Pardoo, Julia (1809-1802)  Pardoo, William (d. 1092)  Pardon, George Frederick (1824-1884)  Para, William (1806-1878)  Paran, Fistenne (1801-1874)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809-1800)  Papworth, Georgo (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, atterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841). See under Papworth, George.  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyatt Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Paradaso, John (1748-1795)  Pardoo, Julia (1806-1802)  Pardoo, William (d. 1092)  Pardon, Crorgo Frederick (1824-1884)  Paront, Etienne (1801-1874)  Paront, Etienne (1801-1874)  Paront-Ross, Euphrosyne Parepa de Boyesku	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809-1809)  Papworth, George (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, afterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyatt Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Paradiso, John (1748-1795)  Pardoc, Julia (1806-1802)  Pardoc, Julia (1806-1803)  Pardon, George Frederick (1824-1884)  Para, William (1805-1878)  Paropa-Ross, Euphrosyne Parepa de Boyesku (1814-1874)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809-1809)  Papworth, George (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, afterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyatt Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Paradiso, John (1748-1795)  Pardoc, Julia (1806-1802)  Pardoc, Julia (1806-1803)  Pardon, George Frederick (1824-1884)  Para, William (1805-1878)  Paropa-Ross, Euphrosyne Parepa de Boyesku (1814-1874)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809-1800)  Papworth, Georgo (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, atterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841). See undor Papworth, Georgo.  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyath Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Pardoo, Julia (1806-1802)  Pardoo, Julia (1806-1802)  Pardoo, William (1.1092)  Pardoo, William (1.1092)  Pardon, Georgo Frederick (1824-1884)  Paroni, Etitenne (1801-1874)  Paroni, Etitenne (1801-1875)  See Wasten	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)
Papworth, Edgar Georgo (1809-1809)  Papworth, George (1781-1855)  Papworth, John, afterwards John Buonarroti (1775-1847)  Papworth, John Thomas (1809-1841)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, John Woody (1820-1870)  Papworth, Wyatt Angelicus Van Sandau (1822-1894)  Paradiso, John (1748-1795)  Pardoc, Julia (1806-1802)  Pardoc, Julia (1806-1803)  Pardon, George Frederick (1824-1884)  Para, William (1805-1878)  Paropa-Ross, Euphrosyne Parepa de Boyesku (1814-1874)	Parker, Henry (1604-1652)

PAGH
Parker, Matthew (1504-1575)	Parnell, Henry Brooke, first Baron Congleton
Parker, Sir Nicholas (1517-1619) 264	(T110-T019) · · ·
Parker, Sir Peter (1721-1811)	Parnell, James (1687?-1656) 312
Perker, Sir Poter (1785-1814)
Parker, Sir Philip (fl. 1580). See under	Parnell, John Vesey, second Baron Congleton
Parker, Henry, eighth Baron Morley.	Parnell, John Vosey, second Baron Congleton (1805–1883). See under Parnell, Henry
Parker, Hichard (1572-1620)
Parker, Robort (156) ?-1611)	Parnell, Thomas (1679-1718). Parnell, William, afterwards Parnell-Hayes
Parker, Richard (1707-1707)     268       Parker, Robort (1661 ?-1611)     260       Parker, Robort (17178)     271       Parker, Samuel (1010-1088)     272       Parker, Samuel (1610-1700)     276       Parker, Samuel (1611-1700)     276       Parker, Samuel (1611-1700)     276
Parker, Samuel (1040 -1088)	Parning Sir Robert (J. 1949)
Parker, Samuel (1681-1780)	Part Bartholomay M D (1750 tero)
Parker, Samuel William Langaton (1809-1871) 276	Parr. Catherine (1512-1548). See Catherine
Parker, Thomas (#. 1581)	sixth queen of Henry VIII.
Parker, Thomas (#.1581)	sixth queen of Henry VIII. Parr, Elmethan (d. 1632?)
Parker, Thomas, first Earl of Macclesfield	Parr, George (1826-1891)
(10667-1732)	Part, Joan (1083 7-1710 7)
Parker, Sir Thomas (1005?-1784)	Part, Nathaniel (Jt. 1780-1769). See under
Parker, Thomas Lister (1779-1868) 288	Parr, Romigius.
Parker, William (fl. 1535). See Malvern.	Parr, Remigius (/l. 1747)
Parker, William (d. 1618)	Parr or Parro, Richard (1592?-1641)
Parker, William, fourth Baron Montongle and oleventh Baron Morley of the first occution	Parr, Richard, D.D. (1617-1691) 856 Parr, Samuel (1747-1825) 856
(1575-1622)	Thomas (11400 9 1000) (A11 T)
Perker, William, D.D. (1714 1802)	The war Olive Williams (140.1 + 100.0)
Perker, Sir William (1743-1802)	Parr, William, Marquis of Northampton and
Parker, Sir William (1781-1866) 288	Thoul of Manor (1519_1571)
Parker, William Kitchen (1820-1890) 200	Parris, Edmund Thomas (1799-1878) 308
Parkes, Alexander (1818-1890)	Parris or Paris, George van (d. 1551) . 1999
Parkes, David (1769-1888)	Parrol or Parrol, Honry (A. 1600-1626) 809
Parkes, Edmund Alexander (1819-1876) . 294	Parry, Bonjamin (1681-1678)
Parkes, Sir Harry Smith (1828-1885) 206 Parkes, James (1794-1828). See under Parkes,	Parry, Calob Hillier (1755-1822)
Parkos, James (1704–1828). See under Parker,	Parry, Charles Heary (1779-1860)
David.	Parry, Charles James (1824-1891). See under
Parkes, Joseph (1798-1865)	Pary, Joseph.
Parkes, Josiah (1798-1871)	Parry, David Henry (1798-1826). Bee under 1'arnos, Monara (fl. 1001)	Parry, Joseph.
Parkes, Samuel (1761-1825)	Parry, Joseph. Parry, Edward (d. 1650)
Parkhouse, Hannah (1748-1809), See Cowley.	Parry, Edward (1880–1890)
Parkhurst, Fordinando (fl. 1880). See under	Parry, Henry (1561-1616)
Parkhurst, John (1564–1689).	Parry, Thomas.
Parkhurst, John (1512?-1575)	Parry, James (d. 1871?). See under Parry,
Parkhurst, John (1504-1089) 809	Joseph.
Parkhurst, John (1728-1707)	Parry, John (d. 1877)
Parkhurst, Nathaniel (1618-1707)	Parry, John (d. 1782)
Parkhurst, Thomas (1020?-1707?)	Parry, John (1776-1851)
Parkin, Charles (1689–1765)	Parry, John Doewer (d. 1888?)
Parkins. See also Parkyns and Porkins.	Parry, John Humbreys (1780-1825)
Parkinson, Anthony, in religion Cuthbort	Parry, John Humffroya (1816-1886) 878
(1667-1728)	Parry, John Orlando (1810-1879)
Parkinson, James (1658–1792)	Parry, Joseph (1711-1896)
Parkinson, James (1780 ?-1818)	Parry, Joshua (1710-1776)
	Parry, Sir Love Purry Jones (1781-1858) 382
Parkinson, John (1507-1650)	Parry, Richard (1560-1628)
Parkinson, Joseph (1788–1855). See under Parkinson, James (1780 ?–1818).	Parry, Richard, D.D. (1722–1780)
Parkinson, Richard (1718–1815)	Parry, Softon Hunry (1822-1887)
Parkinson, Richard, D.D. (1707-1858) 816	T1 (1). (1) / / T PAAL
Parkinson, Stephen, D.D. (1828-1889) 817	Parry, Sir Tuomas (d. 1040)
Daulehagen Gerhau fittik 9 (1991) 019	Parry, Thomas (1795-1870)
Parkinson, Phomas (fl. 1769-1789) 818	Parry, Thomas Cambiar (1816-1888) 886
Parkinson, Synny (1705-1717) Parkinson, Thomas (f. 1709-1780) Parkinson, Thomas (f. 1745-1830) Parkinson, Thomas (1745-1830) Parkyns, Manafield (1832-1894) Parkyns, Manafield (1832-1894)	Parry, William (d. 1585)
Parkyns, Mansfield (1828–1891)	Parry, William (//. 1601) 889
Therefore the ruomas (1004-1741)	Parry, William (d. 1885)
Parkyns or Porkins, Sir William (1010?-1000) B21	Parry, William (1742?-1701)
Parloy, Poter (pseudonym). See Martin, Wit-	THERY, WILLIAM (INDA-1819)
liam (1801-1807); and Mogridge, George.	Parry, William (# 1825)
Permontier, James (Jacques) (1658-1780) . 322	Parry, Sir William Edward (1700-1866) 893
Parnoll, Charles Stawart (1816-1801)	Pars, Honry (1781–1806)
Parnell, Fanny (1854–1882). See under Par- nell, Charles Stewart.	Parsell, Thomas (1674–1720)
CARREAUS DOCKRES.	Parsell, Thomas (1674–1720)

		טדט
	PAGE	7.42
•	Parsley or Persley, Osbert (1511-1585) . 894 Parson, Thomas (1631-1681?) . 895	Paston, Robert, first E erl of Yarmouth (1681-
	Parson, Thomas (1031-1681 ?)	1688)
	Parsons, Abraham (d. 1785)	Paston, William (1978-1444)
	Parsons, Andrew (1616-1684)	Paston, Sir William (1179?-1551)
	Persons, Burtholomew (1574-1642) 896	Paston, Sir William (1528-1610). See under Parsons, Benjamin (1797-1865) 897
	Parsons, Edward (1702-1898).  Parsons, Edward (1707-1844). See under	Pa-ton, William, se old Earl of Yarmouth (1652-1732). See under Paston, Robert,
	Parsons, Edward (1797-1844). See under	(1652-1732). See prider Paston, Robert
	Parsons, Edward (1762-1838).	t mest emerior is increased.
	Parsons, Mrs. Eliza (d. 1811)	Pariorini Renedict (Repoletta)   # 1778_1510   133
	Parsons, Elizabeth (1749-1807)	1. 2. astorius, Francis Dinnel (1661–17197) 1.52
	Parsons, Elizabeth (1812-1873)
	Parsons, Francis (fl. 1703-1763)
	Parsons, Mrs. Contrude (1812-1891)	Pute or Pates, Richard (d. 1565)
	Parsons, Humphrey (1676?-1741)	Pates or Pates, Richard (d. 1565) 455 Pute, Richard (1510-1568) 457 Pate, Richard (1510-1568) 457 Pater, William (1666-1746) 457 Pater, Wilter Horatio (1839-1894) 459
	Parsons, James (1705-1770)	Pate, William (1666-1746)
	Parsons, James (1762-1817)	Pater, Walter Horatio (1839-1894)
	F 1 12 amount	T THE THE TOTAL ( JE. 800). See FRUARD.
	EREBOIR, Other (II. 1020)	, Liteison. See also Patterson.
	Parsons, John (1712-1785)	Puterson, Alexander (1766-1831) 460
	Parsons, John (1761-1819)	Paterson, Charles William (1750-1841). 461
	Parsons, John Mec-on (1708-1870)	Paterson, Daniel (1739-1825)
	Parsons, Sir Lawronce (d. 1898)	Paterson, Mrs. Emma Anne (1818-1886) . 462
	Parsons, fir Lawrence, second Earl of Rosse	Paterson, Jumes (1805-1876)
	(1758-1811)	Puterson, John (1632-1709)
	Parsons, Philip (1591–1659)	Paterson, John (1776–1855)
	Parsons, Philip (1729-1812)	Paterson, Nathaniel, D.D. (1787-1871) 466
		Paterson, Robert (1715-1801)
		Paterson, Samuel (1728-1802)
		Paterson, Thomas (1780-1858)
	Parsons, Robert (1647–1714) 418 Parsons, Sir William (1670?–1650) 419	Paterson, William (1658-1719)
	Parsons, William (1008-1725?)	Paterson, William (1658-1719)   468   Paterson, William (1756-1810)   471   Pateshull, Hugh de (d. 1241)   478
	Parsons, William (17:00-1705)	Pateshull, Hugh de (d. 1211)
	Parsons, William ( /l. 1785-1807)	Pateshull or Pattishall, Sir Simon de.
	Parsons, Sir William (1746?-1817)	Pateshull, Martin de (d. 1929) 478
	Parsons, William, third Earl of Rosse (1800-	Pateshull, Peter (fl. 1387)
	1807)	Pateshull or Pattishall, Simon de (d. 1217?) . 474
	Partington, Charles Frederick (d. 1857?) . 427	Pateshull or Pattishall, Sir Simon de (d. 1271) 473
	Partridge, John (#. 1566)	Pateshull, Walter de (d. 1232) 475
	Partridge, John (1641-1715) 428	Patey, Charles George Edward (1813-1881) . 475
	Partridge, John (1790–1872)	Patey, Janet Monach (1812-1894) 178
	Partridge, Joseph (1724-1796)	Patient or Patience, Thomas (d. 1866) . 476
	Partridge, Str Miles (d. 1552)	l Patin, William ( ft. 1548-1580). See Patten.
	Partridge, Partricke, or Pertrick, Peter (d.	Patmore, Peter George (1786-1655) 478
	1461)	Paton, Andrew Archibald (1811–1874) . 478
	Partridge, Richard (1805-1878)	Paton, David ( fl. 1650-1700) 479
	Partidge, Soth (1608-1686)	} Paton, George (1721–1807)
	Parvus, John (d. 1180). See John of Salisbury.	Paton, James (d. 1596)
	Parys, William (d. 1009)	Paton, James (d. 1684)
	Paschal, John (d. 1861)	Paton, John Stafford (1821–1889) 481
	Pasco, John (1774–1858)	Paton, Mary Ann, afterwards Mrs. Wood
	Pascon, Francis Polkinghorne (1818-1898) . 485
	Passiold or Pashfield, Robert. See under	Paton, Richard (1716?-1791)
	Bruen, John (1560–1625). Panho or Pasche, William (fl. 1500?) 485	Patrick (878–103)
	Passho or Passho, William (ft. 1500?) . 485 Passhoy, Robort (1806–1859) . 430 Passko, Thomas, D.D. (d. 1002) . 486 Passkoy, Charles (1824–1809) . 487	Patrick (d. 1081)
	Panke, Thomas, D.D. (d. 1002)	Patrick, John (1682–1695)
	Pusley, Charles (1824–1890)	Patrick, Richard (1700-1815)
	Pasley, Sir Charles William (1780-1861) . 489	Patrick, Samuel (1684-1748)
	l'asloy, Hir Thomas (1784-1808)	Patrick, Simon (d. 1613) 490
	Pastoy, Sir Thomas Sabine (1804-1884) 442	Patrick, Simon (1626-1707)
	Pasor, Matthias (1599-1658)	. Patrington, Stephen (d. 1417)
	Pasor, Matthias (1599–1658)	Patten, George (1801-1865)
	(1695 ?-1647), and William (1598 ?-1687 ?) . 448	Patten, George (1801–1865) . 498 Patten, John Wilson, Baron Winmarleigh (1802–1892). See Wilson-Patten.
	Passolowo or Passolo, Edmund de (d. 1827) . 114	(1802-1892). See Wilson-Patten.
	Parsolowe of Parsolou, Hobert (4. 1252) 444	Patten, Robert (fl. 1715)
	Passolowo, Simon (#. 1200)	Patten, Thomas (1711-1790)
	Paston, Clement (1515?-1507) 446	Patten or Pattyn, William (d. 1486). See
	Passolowo, Simon (ff. 1200)	Waynflete.
	Paston, John (1121–1460)	Patten, William (fl. 1548-1580)
	Paston, Sir John (1442–1479)	Pattenson, Matthew (ft. 1628)

	1
Patterner Hanning Determine	u., ]	Doubless (2 gar)	AGE
Patterson. See also Paterson. Patterson, John Brown (1801–1885) 4	1861		541
Pattergon Robort (1909-1970)	96		548
Patterson, Robort (1802–1872) Patterson, Robort Hogarth (1821–1886) Patterson, William (1755–1810). See Paterson.		Paulton, Abraham Waltor (1812-1876)	515
Patherson William (1765-1810) And Paterson.	۱	Pauper, Herbert (d. 1217). See Poor. Pauper, Roger (fl. 1195). See Roger.
Patteson, Str John (1790-1861) 4	លេខ
Patteson, John Coleridge (1827-1871) 4	BOL	Payer, William (1809-1971)	545
	101	Parton George (17/0-1997)	510
	101	Paylon, James (1788-1880)	51/
Pattison, Dorothy Wyndlow, known as Sistor		Payton John (// 1780)	ŭ17
Dora (1832–1878)	:02	Payton Que Inamb (1901 1902)	814
	508 l	Povton Polos (d. 1911)	218
Pattison, Mark (1818–1884)	i08	Paxton, Stephen (1705-1787)	210 210
Pattison, William (1706-1727) 5	508	Paxton, William (fl. 1780). Soo under Pay	410
Pation, Charles (1741–1837). See under Pat-	ŀ	ton, Stophon, ton, Philip.	ı	Poso Hansy (# 1405_1415)	550
Patton, George, Lord Glenalmond (1808-1869) 5	509 ]	Paye, Richard Morton (d. 1821)	650
Patton, Plulip (1789–1815) 5	10	Payne. See also Lam and Lune.
Patton, Robert (1712-1812). See under	ĺ	Payne, George (1781-1818)	551
Patton, Philip.	)		552
Pattrick or Patrick, George (1746-1800) 5	11	Payne, Honry Neville (ft. 1072-1710)	558
Patys, Richard (d. 1565). See Pute.		Payne, John (d. 1506)	554
Paul or Pol (d. 578), saint, also called Aurolian 5	177	Payne, John (d. 1617?)	535
Paul (d. 1008)		Payno, John (d. 1787)	555
Paul, Earl of Orknoy (d. 1009) 5	iTS (	Payne, John (fl. 1800). See under Payne, John (d. 1787).
Paul the Silent, Earl of Orkney (A. 1180).	ļ	Dome tale Willel (1950 1900)
See under Paul, Harl of Orkney.		Payne, John Willett (1759-1808)	550
	515		557
Paul of St. Magdalen (1599-1618). Soo Hoalh,		Payno, Poter (d. 1455) Payne, Sir Poter (1768–1848)	539
Paul, Eir George Onesiphorus (1746-1820) . 5	ur l	Payne, Sir Ralph, Baron Lavington (1788?-	568
Paul, Hamilton (1778–1854)			534
Paul, Isabella Howard (1888?-1879) 5			665
Paul, John (1707-1787)		Payne, Roger (1789-1797)	500
Paul, John, D.D. (1777-18(8)		Payne. Thomas (1719-1790)	507
Paul, Sir John Denn (1802-1868) 5		Payne, Thomas, the younger (1752-1831)	508
Paul, Lewis (d. 1759)		Pavile, William, D.D. (1650-1696)	KAR
Paul, Sir Onesiphorus (1706-1774). Hee under	- 1	Payne, William (fl. 1800) Payne, William Henry Bohoffold (1804-1878)	500
Paul, Sir George Onesiphorus.	- {	Payne, William Henry Bohofield (1804-1878)	509
Paril Robort Batoman (1708-1877)	20	Tayne Sinten, Monore (1819-1896)	570
Paul, William de (d. 1849)	21	Paynell. See also Paganell.
Paul, William (1509-1005)		Paynell, Maurice de, Baron of Leeds (1151?-
Paul, William de (d. 1849)		_ 1280). Hee Gaunt.
1.Britani' Thomas (1030-11101)	28	Paynell, Phomas ( ft. 1528-1567)	572
Paule, Sir George (1568?-1087) 5	87 T	Payntor, Thomas (A. 026-1007) Payntor, David William (1701-1898) Payntor or Cambourne, William (1687-1716) Poabody, Churlos William (1800-1880) Poabban, Edungol (1864-2-1616)	574
Paulet. See also L'owlet.	ı	Paynter or Cambourne, William (1087-1716).	674
Punlot or Poulet, Sir Amias or Amyas (d.	(	Pendody, George (1790-1809)	075
1588) , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , ,	MD	Conclusion Wilmond (1884 9 3000)	076
Paulet or Poulet, Sir Amins (1580 ?-1588) . 5	12510
Pauletor Fowlett, Charles, first Duke of Bolton		Possiball Son also Bookell	578
(1625?-1699) Paulet or Powlett, Charles, second Duke of	28	Peacham, Honry (1878?—1648?) Peachell. See also Pechell. Peachell, John (1636—1639)	581
Bolton (1601–1722)	20	Peachi, John (fl. 1690). See under Pechey
Paulet or Powlett, Charles, third Duke of	1,24	John.	•
Bolton (1085-1754)	nn l		582
	81	Pencock, Dmitri Radolf (1842-1802)	682
Paulot or Powlett, Harry, sixth Duke of	1	Poscock, Frederick Barnes (1886-1804). See
Bolton (1710-1794)	82	under Peacock, Sir Barnes.
Paulot, Harry (d. 1804)	1113	Poncook, George (1791-1858)	. 589
Paulot or Poulet, Sir Hugh (d. 1572?) 5		Pencock, Cleorge (1805-1888)	. 585
Paulot, Sir John (fl. 1500). See under Paulet	.	Peacock, James (d. 1658).	. 686 or Poulet, Sir Amias or Amyas. Paulet, John, fifth Marquis of Winchester	- 1	Pencock, James (1788?-1814).	, 687
Paulot, John, fifth Marquis of Winehester	- (	Poncock, John Macleny (1817-1877)	. 587
/7.698_1876)	86	Peacock, Lucy (1. 1815)	. 688
Paulot, Lavinia, Duchoss of Bolton (1708– 1760). See Fonton. Paulot, Pawlot, or Poulot, William, first Mar-	Į	Peacook, Reginald (1895?-1450?). Sec	)
_ 1760) See Fonton.	J	Ponoek.
Paulot, Pawlot, or Poulot, William, first Mar-		Peacock, Thomas (1516?-1582?)	. 588
anis of windoestor (1440 7-1072)	87	Peacock, Thomas (1516?-1582?). Peacock, Thomas Bevil, M.D. (1812-1882) Peacock (Whomas Leve (1795-1818)	. 588
Paulet, William, third Marquis of Winolicstor	- 1	TOGODOW! I HORITICAL MANOR THIS TOWN !	. 689
	40		. 592 500
Paulet, Lord William (1801-1808)	10	Poak or Poake, James (1780 ?-1782 ?) Poake, Richard Bringley (1792-1847)	. 692 800
Paulinus ( fl. 500 ?)	41 .	L'ORICO, INDREND IDEIREIQU (TYPE-184Y)	, 599

	P	AGE	-	AGE
Peake, Sir Robert (1502 ?-1667)		593	Peckham, Sir Edmund (1495?-1504)
Peake, Thomas (1771-1888)		598	Deckhorn Gir Conner (2 sees)	884
Penroe. See also Pearse and Pierce	•	000	Peckham, Sir George (d. 1608)	684
Pearce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Pearce, Sir Edward Lovet (d. 1788)		Pa. 1	Peckham, John (d. 1292).	685
Teatoe, dir marata moves (a. 1100)	•	594	Peckitt, William (1781-1795)	642
Pearce, Nathaniel (1779-1820)		594	Peckwell, Henry (1747-1787)	648
Pearce, Samuel (1768–1799)  Pearce, Thomas (fl. 1755)		695	Peckwell, afterwards Blosset, Sir Robert
Pearce, Thomas (fl. 1755)		595	Henry (1776-1828). See under Peckwell,
Pearce, Sir William (1888–1888) Pearce, Zaohary (1690–1774) Peard, George (1694 7–1644) Peard, John Whitehead (1811–1880)		595	Henry.
Pearce, Zachary (1690-1774)		598	Pennels Regime Id (1908 9 1490 9)	040
Paged (hoorge [1504 2-1844)	•	607	Pecock, Reginald (1895 ?-1460 ?)	648
Pourd John Whitehand (1911-1990)	•		Pecthelm (d. 785)	647
Tourist with the control of the cont	•	598	Pectivin (d. 776)	648
Peard, Shuldham (1761-1882)		599 J	Pedder, John (1520 ?-1571)	648
Pearl, Cora (1842–1886) Pearman, William (fl. 1810–1824) Pears, Steuart Adolphus (1815–1875)		600	Peddie, James (1758-1845)	648
Pearman, William (fl. 1810-1824)		600	Peddie, John (d. 1810) Peddie, William (1805-1898). See under	649
Pears, Steuari, Adolphus (1815-1875)	•	601	Poddio William (1905 1900) Ca-	UXD
Pears, Sir Thomas Townsend (1809-1892	· ·	601	Peddie, William (1805-1898). See under
Tenenall Dishard (1800 1880)	۰, ۰		Peddie, James,
Pearsall, Richard (1698-1762)		602	Peden, Alexander (1826?–1886)	630
Pearsall, Robert Lucas (de) (1795-1856).		603	Pedley, Robert (1760-1841). See Deverell.
Pearse. See also Pearce, Pierce, and Pi	ers.		Pedrog (fl. 550 ?)	651
Peurse, Edward (1688?-1674?)		100	Peebles or Peblis, David (d. 1579)	852
	ınder	~ [	Donoko Dishard of Bernstell (# 1608) Gas	002
	mder	- 1	Peecke, Richard, of Tavistock (fl. 1626). See
Pearse, Edward (1688 ?-1874?).		1	Pike.
Pearse, Thomas Deane (1788?-1789) .		605	Peal, John (1776-1854)	652
Pearse, William (1625-1001). See r	ınder		Peel, Jonathan (1799-1879)	052
Poorse, Edward (1688 ?-1674 ?).			Peel, Sir Lawrence (1799-1884)	654
Peurson. See also Peerson, Peirson,	5rr.e		Peel, Paul (1861-1892)	654
Pierson
	1		Peel, Sir Robert, first Baronet (1750–1880)	654
Pearson, Alexander (d. 1657), lord of sec	apron1		Peel, Sir Robert, second Baronet (1788-1850)	855
under the title of Lord Southall	•	605	Peel, Sir Robert, third Baronet (1822-1895) .	668
Pearson, Anthony (1028-1670?)		606	Peel, Sir William (1824-1858).	669
Pearson, Charles Buchanan (1807-1881).	See		Poel, William Yeates (1789–1858). See under under Pearson, Hugh Nicholas.			Peel, Sir Robert, first Baronet (1750-1830).
Pearson, Charles Henry (1880-1894)		607	Peale, George (1558 ?-1597 ?)	670
Design Princed (1980 1911)			Does dough (1990 1-1991 1),
Pearson, Edward (1756-1811) .		609	Peend or De la Peend, Thomas (fl. 1565)	674
Pearson, Eglington Margaret (d. 1823),	See		Peer, William (d. 1718)	675
under Pearson, James.			Peeris, William (fl. 1520)	675
Pearson, Goorge (1751-1828)		610	Peers, Richard (1645–1690)	675
Pearson, Hugh (1817-1882). See u	inder		Peers, Richard (1685-1759). See under Peers,
Pearson, Hugh Nicholas.			Richard (1645~1090).
Design Trush Nahalas (1979-1958)		277	Descent of Descent Andrew (d 1504)	676
Pearson, Hugh Nicholas (1776–1856)	•	611	Peerson or Pierson, Andrew (d. 1594) Peerson, Pierson, or Pearson, Martin (1590 ?-	010
		612	: Peerson, Pierson, or Pearson, Martin (1990 ?-
Pearson, James (d. 1805).
Pearson, James (4. 1805)	,	618	1651?)	677
Pearson, James (d. 1805). Pearson, John (1618–1686) Pearson, John (1758–1826)			1651?)	677 678
Pearson, John (1618–1686)		618 618	1651?)   Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1582–1592)
Pearson, John (1618–1686) Pearson, John (1758–1826) Pearson, Sir John (1619–1866)		618 618 619	1651 ?) Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1582-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1667-1727)	678 678
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1686) Pearson, Sir John (1619-1886) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885)		618 618 619 619	1651 ?) Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1582–1592) Peeters or Picters, John (1687–1727) Pogge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785–1822)	678 678 678
Pearson, John (1018-1080) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800)		618 618 619 619 619	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (ff. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Sampel, the elder (1704-1796)	678 678 678 678
Pearson, John (1018-1080) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1910-1986) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Bir Richard (1781-1800)		618 618 619 619 619 620	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (ff. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Sampel, the elder (1704-1796)	678 678 678 678 680
Pearson, John (1018-1080) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1910-1986) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Bir Richard (1781-1800)		618 619 619 619 620 621	1651?) Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1582–1502) Pesters or Pieters, John (1667–1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765–1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704–1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788–1800) Pelle, Thomas Williamson (1806–1882)	678 678 678 678
Pearson, John (1018-1080) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1910-1986) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Bir Richard (1781-1800)		618 618 619 619 619 620	1651?) Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1582-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1667-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1786-1800) Pelle, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce.	678 678 678 678 680 680
Pearson, John (1018-1080) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1910-1986) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Bir Richard (1781-1800)		618 619 619 619 620 621	Pesters, Gerard (ff. 1682-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1974-2-1786)	678 678 678 678 680
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1866) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1860) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847). Pearson, Jevris, William Henley (1818-1		618 619 619 619 620 621	Pesters, Gerard (ff. 1682-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1974-2-1786)	678 678 678 678 680 680
Pearson, John (1018-1080) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Peurson, William (1767-1847) Pearson-Jervis, William Henley (1818-1868) See Jervis.		618 618 619 619 619 620 621 621	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1809-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 2-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Pairson. Francis (1767-1781)	678 678 678 678 680 680
Pearson, John (1018-1080) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Peurson, William (1767-1847) Pearson-Jervis, William Henley (1818-1868) See Jervis.	1888).	618 618 619 619 620 621 621	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1809-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 2-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Pairson. Francis (1767-1781)	678 678 678 678 680 680 681
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Bir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Rachard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis, William Henley (1818-1804) Pears, Jidward (17667-1824)	1888).	618 619 619 619 620 621 621	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1809-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 2-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Pairson. Francis (1767-1781)	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1826) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1888) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1888) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Peurson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866) See Jervis. Peart, Charles (fl. 1778-1708) Pearse, Edward (1767-1854) Pease, Iddward (1767-1854)	1888).	618 618 619 619 620 621 621	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1809-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 2-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Pairson. Francis (1767-1781)	678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1826) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1888) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1888) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Peurson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866) See Jervis. Peart, Charles (fl. 1778-1708) Pearse, Edward (1767-1854) Pease, Iddward (1767-1854)	1888).	618 619 619 619 620 621 621	1051?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874?-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelagins (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellegin Sir Edmund (fl. 1606)	678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1768-1886) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1768-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis, Peart, Charles (fl. 1778-1798) Pears, Edward (1767-1868) Pease, Edward (1707-1868) Pease, Honry (1807-1881). See under E	1888).	618 619 619 619 620 621 621	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Pelle, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874?-1728) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1767-1781) Pelaging (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Sir Edmund (dl. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See	678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685 687
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1768-1886) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1768-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis, Peart, Charles (fl. 1778-1798) Pears, Edward (1767-1868) Pease, Edward (1707-1868) Pease, Honry (1807-1881). See under E	L888).	618 619 619 619 620 621 621	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Pelle, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874?-1781) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1767-1781) Pelaging (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Sir Edmund (dl. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See	678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685 687
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1826) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1888) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1888) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1806) Pearson, Rachard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1806) See Jervis. Peart, Charles (fl. 1778-1798) Pears, Edward (1767-1858) Pease, Edward (1707-1851). See under F Edward. Posse, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F	L888).	618 619 619 619 620 621 621	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1890) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 2-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1767-1781) Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester.	678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685 687
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir John (1811-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1768-1886) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1768-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson-Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866) See Jervis. Pears, Charles (fl. 1778-1798). Pears, Edward (1767-1884) Pease, Houry (1807-1881). See under F Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F Edward.	L888).	618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628	Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1887-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the aldar (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the selder (1704-1796) Pelle, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1974-2-1728) Peirson, James (1974-2-1728) Peirson, Francis (1787-1781) Pelagius (fl. 4007) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester.	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1866) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis, 1804-1868) Pearst, Gharles (fl. 1778-1798) Pearst, Iddward (1767-1888) Pease, Edward (1707-1888) Pease, Honry (1807-1881). See under F. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1709-1872). See under P. Edward.	L888).	618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628	Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1887-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the aldar (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the selder (1704-1796) Pelle, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1974-2-1728) Peirson, James (1974-2-1728) Peirson, Francis (1787-1781) Pelagius (fl. 4007) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester.	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1826) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1988) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1988) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1806) Pearson, Rachard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1808-1892) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1808-1892) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1808) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1808) Pears, Joharles (fl. 1778-1798) Pears, Idward (fl. 1767-1858) Pease, Idward (1707-1851). See under F. Edward. Peast, Thomas (1708-1780) Pebody, Charles (1880-1890)	l888). Cense,	618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628	Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1887-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the aldar (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the selder (1704-1796) Pelle, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1974-2-1728) Peirson, James (1974-2-1728) Peirson, Francis (1787-1781) Pelagius (fl. 4007) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester.	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1766-1886) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1766-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hocke (1806-1892) Pearson-Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866) See Jervis. Peart, Charles (fl. 1778-1798). Peart, Edward (1767-1884) Pease, Houry (1807-1881). See under P. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under P. Edward. Peak, Thomas (1708-1780) Peoho, Richard (1768-1780)	l888). Cense,	618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 ?-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1767-1781) Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514). Pellam, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, George, D.D. (1768-1827) Pelham, Henry (1895 ?-1754)	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1766-1886) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1766-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hocke (1806-1892) Pearson-Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866) See Jervis. Peart, Charles (fl. 1778-1798). Peart, Edward (1767-1884) Pease, Houry (1807-1881). See under P. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under P. Edward. Peak, Thomas (1708-1780) Peoho, Richard (1768-1780)	l888). Cense,	618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 7-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514). Pellam, Sir Edmund (dl. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chiohester. Pelham, George, D.D. (1768-1827) Pelham, Henry (1895 ?-1754). Pelham, Henry (1749-1806). See under Pelham, Peter.	678 678 678 678 680 681 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, William Henley (1818-1866) Pears, Charles (fl. 1778-1798) Pears, Charles (fl. 1778-1798) Pears, Iddward (1767-1868) Pease, Iddward (1707-1868) Pease, Iddward (1707-1881). See under F. Edward. Peas, Joseph (1700-1872). See under F. Edward. Peas, Joseph (1700-1878). Peak, Thomas (1708-1780) Peobody, Charles (1880-1890) Peobel, Richard (d. 1188)	1888).	618 618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628 625 626	Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1887-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Pelle, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 ?-1728) Peirson. See also Pearson and Piercon. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelagins (fl. 4007) Pelagins (fl. 4007) Pellam, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, Henry (1749-1806). See under Pelham, Henry (1749-1806).	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1826) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Rachard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Peurson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pears, Idward (17667-1884) Pears, Edward (1767-1858) Pearse, Edward (1797-1858) Pease, Honry (1807-1881). See under F. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under P. Peabell, Sicolasof (d. 1182). Peachell, Scolasof Peachell. Peachell, Sicolasof Cachell. Peachell, Sicolasof Cachell.	1888).	618 618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628 625 626	Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1890) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874 2-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, Henry (1895 2-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895 2-1754) Pelham, Henry (1749-1806). See under Pelham, Peter. Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886).	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1886) Pearson, Sir Hichard (1781-1865) Pearson, Bir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hocke (1806-1892) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866) See Jervis. Peart, Charlos (fl. 1778-1708) Pearse, Hdward (fl. 1767-1898) Pease, Hdward (1767-1898) Pease, Honry (1807-1891). See under P. Edward. Peak, Thomas (1708-1780) Peoke, Thomas (1708-1780) Peoke, Richard (fl. 1818) Peokell, See also Peachell. Peachell, See also Peachell. Peachell, See also Peachell. Peachell, See Coorgo Richard Brooke (1880)	1789-	618 618 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 625 625 626	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1674?-1726) Peirson, Gee also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelsgins (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellnam, Sir Edmund (dl. 1600) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1804-1886).	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 687 688
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis, Peart, Charles (fl. 1778-1798) Pears, Holward (1767-1868) Pease, Edward (1707-1868) Pease, Hunry (1807-1881). See under F. Edward. Peas, Joseph (1709-1872). See under F. Edward. Peak, Thomas (1708-1780) Peohody, Charles (1880-1890) Peohol, Richard (d. 1188) Peachell, Sir Goorge Richard Brooke (1800) Peohell, Sir Goorge Richard Brooke (1800)	L888).	618 618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628 625 626	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1674?-1726) Peirson, Gee also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelsgins (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellnam, Sir Edmund (dl. 1600) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1804-1886).	678 678 678 678 680 681 685 687 688 689
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1826) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Rachard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Peurson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pearse, Jedward (1767-1858) Pearse, Edward (1767-1858) Pease, Honry (1807-1881). See under F. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F. Bdward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F. Peabell, Sir Coorgo Richard Brooke (1800) Pechell, Sir Coorgo Richard Brooke (1800) Pechell, Sir Paul (1724-1800). Pechell, Sir Paul (1724-1800).	888). 6886, 7886,	618 618 619 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 625 625 625 626	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1674?-1726) Peirson, Gee also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelsgins (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellnam, Sir Edmund (dl. 1600) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1804-1886).	678 678 678 678 680 681 685 687 688 689 698 698
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, John (1758-1820) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1888) Pearson, John Norman (1787-1885) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pearson-Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pearson, Jervis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pears, Lidward (1767-1884) Pears, Edward (1767-1884) Pears, Houry (1807-1881). See under P. Edward. Poaso, Joseph (1799-1872). See under P. Edward. Peably, Thomas (1708-1780) Peachell, Sic also Poachell. Peachell, Sic Goorge Richard Brooke (1880) Peachell, Sir Goorge Richard Brooke (1880) Peachell, Sir Samuel John Brooke (1840)	888). 6886, 7886,	618 618 619 619 620 621 622 628 628 628 625 626 627 628	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1823) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1809-1882) Peirce, See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1074 ?-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, George, D.D. (1766-1827) Pelham, Henry (1749-1806). See under Pelham, Peter. Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, Herbert (1800-1768) Pelham, Herbert (1800-1768)	678 678 678 678 680 681 685 687 688 689
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pears, Jidward (1707-1868) Pears, Idward (1707-1868) Pears, Idward (1707-1868) Pease, Idward (1707-1881). See under F. Edward. Peas, Joseph (1700-1872). See under F. Edward. Peas, Joseph (1700-1872). See under P. Edward. Peak, Thomas (1708-1780) Pechol, Richard (d. 1183) Pechell, Sir Goorge Richard Brooke (1800) Pecholl, Sir Paul (1734-1800) Pechell, Sir Paul (1734-1800) Pechell, Sir Samuel John Brooke (1840) Pechov, John (1655-1716)	888). 6886, 7886,	618 618 619 619 620 621 622 628 628 628 625 626 627 628 627	1651?) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1682-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1687-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1785-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the alder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874?-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peileson. Francis (1757-1781) Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, George, D.D. (1766-1827) Pelham, Henry (1749-1806). See under Pelham, Peter. Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, Herbert (1800-1768) Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, Bir Nicholas (1517-1560). See under	678 678 678 678 680 681 685 687 688 689 698 698
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866) Pears, Jidward (1707-1868) Pears, Idward (1707-1868) Pears, Idward (1707-1868) Pease, Idward (1707-1881). See under F. Edward. Peas, Joseph (1700-1872). See under F. Edward. Peas, Joseph (1700-1872). See under P. Edward. Peak, Thomas (1708-1780) Pechol, Richard (d. 1183) Pechell, Sir Goorge Richard Brooke (1800) Pecholl, Sir Paul (1734-1800) Pechell, Sir Paul (1734-1800) Pechell, Sir Samuel John Brooke (1840) Pechov, John (1655-1716)	888). 6886, 7886,	618 618 619 619 620 621 622 628 628 628 625 626 627 628	Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1867-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1674 ?-1786) Peirson, Francis (1767-1781) Pelsgins (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Sir Edmund (dl. 1600) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, Henry (1895 ?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895 ?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1749-1806). See under Pelham, Peter. Pelham, Henry (1804-1886). Pelham, Henry 17600-1768) Pelham, Herbert (1800-1768) Pelham, John de (dl. 1429) Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, Sir Nicholas (1617-1560). See under	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 687 688 689 698 698 698 698
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1826) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Peurson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1868) Pearse, Jenvis. Peart, Gharles (7. 1778-1798) Peart, Idward (17667-1884) Pease, Edward (1767-1863) Pease, Henry (1807-1881). See under F. Edward. Pease, Honry (1807-1881). See under F. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F. Bdward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F. Bdward. Pease, Johns (1708-1760) Pebody, Charles (1889-1890) Pechell, Sir Coorgo Richard Brooke (1880) Peachell, Sir Paul (1724-1800) Pechell, Sir Famuel John Brooke (1849) Peach, John (1655-1716) Peck, Francis (1692-1748)	888). 6886, 7886,	618 618 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628 625 625 626 627 628 627	Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1867-1727) Pegge, Sir Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1674 ?-1786) Peirson, Francis (1767-1781) Pelsgins (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514) Pellam, Sir Edmund (dl. 1600) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, Henry (1895 ?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1895 ?-1754) Pelham, Henry (1749-1806). See under Pelham, Peter. Pelham, Henry (1804-1886). Pelham, Henry 17600-1768) Pelham, Herbert (1800-1768) Pelham, John de (dl. 1429) Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, Sir Nicholas (1617-1560). See under	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 687 688 689 698 698 698 698
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, William (1767-1847). Pearson, William (1767-1847). Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis. Pears, Idarlos (fl. 1778-1798). Pears, Edward (1767-1858) Pears, Edward (1767-1858) Pears, Honry (1807-1881). See under Pease, Idaward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under Padward. Pease, Thomas (1708-1780) Peoholy, Charles (1889-1890) Peoholl, Sir Goorgo Richard Brooke (1890) Pechell, Sir Famuel John Brooke (1849) Pechoy, John (1655-1716) Peck, Francis (1692-1746) Peck, Francis (1692-1746) Peck, Francis (1692-1746)	888). 6886, 7886,	618 618 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628 628 628 628 628 628 628	Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1867-1727) Pegge, Sar Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874?-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyee (fl. 1514). Pelham, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, George, D.D. (1766-1827) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754). Pelham, Henry (1749-1866). See under Pelham, Peter. Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, Sir Nicholas (1817-1560). See under Pelham, Sir Nicholas (1817-1560).	678 678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 687 688 689 698 698 698
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, John (1758-1896) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1765-1886) Pearson, William (1767-1847). Pearson, William (1767-1847). Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1866 Jervis. Pears, Idarlos (fl. 1778-1798). Pears, Edward (1767-1858) Pears, Edward (1767-1858) Pears, Honry (1807-1881). See under Pease, Idaward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under Padward. Pease, Thomas (1708-1780) Peoholy, Charles (1889-1890) Peoholl, Sir Goorgo Richard Brooke (1890) Pechell, Sir Famuel John Brooke (1849) Pechoy, John (1655-1716) Peck, Francis (1692-1746) Peck, Francis (1692-1746) Peck, Francis (1692-1746)	888). 6886, 7886,	618 618 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628 625 626 627 628 627 628 629 629 629	Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Peeters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Peeters or Pieters, John (1867-1727) Pegge, Sar Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874?-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Peirson, Francis (1757-1781) Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyee (fl. 1514). Pelham, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, George, D.D. (1766-1827) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754). Pelham, Henry (1749-1866). See under Pelham, Peter. Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, Sir Nicholas (1817-1560). See under Pelham, Sir Nicholas (1817-1560).	678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 687 688 689 698 698 698 698
Pearson, John (1618-1686) Pearson, John (1758-1826) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir John (1810-1868) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1865) Pearson, Sir Richard (1781-1800) Pearson, Richard, M.D. (1708-1886) Pearson, Thomas Hooke (1806-1892) Peurson, William (1767-1847) Pearson, Jorvis, William Henley (1818-1868) Pearse, Jenvis. Peart, Gharles (7. 1778-1798) Peart, Idward (17667-1884) Pease, Edward (1767-1863) Pease, Henry (1807-1881). See under F. Edward. Pease, Honry (1807-1881). See under F. Edward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F. Bdward. Pease, Joseph (1799-1872). See under F. Bdward. Pease, Johns (1708-1760) Pebody, Charles (1889-1890) Pechell, Sir Coorgo Richard Brooke (1880) Peachell, Sir Paul (1724-1800) Pechell, Sir Famuel John Brooke (1849) Peach, John (1655-1716) Peck, Francis (1692-1748)	888). 6886, 7886,	618 618 619 619 620 621 621 622 628 628 628 628 628 628 628 628 628	Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters, Gerard (fl. 1882-1592) Pesters or Pieters, John (1867-1727) Pegge, Sar Christopher, M.D. (1765-1822) Pegge, Samuel, the elder (1704-1796) Pegge, Samuel, the younger (1788-1800) Peile, Thomas Williamson (1806-1882) Peirce. See also Pearse and Pierce. Peirce, James (1874?-1726) Peirson. See also Pearson and Pierson. Pelagius (fl. 400?) Pelgrim, Joyce (fl. 1514). Pelham, Sir Edmund (d. 1606) Pelham, Frederick Thomas (1808-1861). See under Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester. Pelham, George, D.D. (1768-1827) Pelham, Henry (1895?-1754). Pelham, Henry (1749-1866). See under Pelham, Peter. Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, Henry Thomas, third Earl of Chichester (1804-1886). Pelham, John de (d. 1428) Pelham, John Thomas, D.D. (1811-1894) Pelham, Sir Nicholas (1617-1560). See under Pelham, Sir Edmund. Pelham, Peter (d. 1761)	678 678 678 678 678 680 680 681 685 687 688 689 698 698 698

PAGE
Pellum, Thomas, first Earl of Chichester	Pencester, Pouchester, or Penshurst, Stephen
(1728-1805)	1 40 (7), 1290) 1
Pelham, Thomas, second Earl of Chichester	Ponda (577 ?=655)
(1756–1826)	Pondaryog John (1899-1868)
Pelham, Sir William (d. 1587)	Penderel, Richard (d. 1672)
Pollam-Holles, Thomas, Duke of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and of Newcastle-under-Lyme	Prondorgast,
(1608–1708)	Pendlebury, Honry (1626-1605) . 785
Poll, John (1611–1685)	Pondiepury, James (a. 17857)
Poll, Sir Watkin Owon (1788-1869) 708	Pendloton, Frederick Houry Snow (1818-
Poll, William (1684-1698)	1888)
Pollatt, Apsley (1791-1868)
Pellogrini, Carlo (1889-1889)	Pondragon, Uther. See under Arthur.
Pelleti, Thomas, M.D. (1871?-1744) 710	The seller Clin City Comment (1978, 1996)
1)-11-m Til-mail Cost Tilesant Tilesant
Pellew, Edward, first Viscount Exmouth	Pengelly, William (1812-1804)
(1757–1888)	Penington. See also Pennington.
Pellew, Sir Fleetwood Broughton Reynolds	Penington, Edward (1667-1711). See under (1789–1861)	Penington or Pennington, Isaac, the Pollew, George (1793–1866) 716	younger.
Pollow, Sir Israel (1758–1882)	Penington or Pennington, Sir Isaac (1587?
Pollew or Pollow, Thomas (A. 1788) 718	1000)
Pellham, Edward (fl. 1680)	Ponington or Pennington, Isaac, the younger
Tallian Talana (70, 2000) ,	TOUTHERN OF T COMME CONT THEORY OF A PORTING
Polling, Edward (d. 1718)	(1616-1679)
Tony, are some figures (1777-1688)	Penington, Sir John (1568?-1616) 745
Pelly, Sir Lowis (1825–1892)	Penington, John (1055-1710). Secunder Pen.
Polly, Bayillo Marriott (1819-1805). See	ington or Ponnington, Issae, the vonner.
under Pelly, Sir Lewis.	Ponkoth, Thomas (d. 1487)
Pember, Robert (d. 1560)	Penkethman, John (fl. 1008)
Pemberton, Charles Reece (1790-1810) 728	Penloy, Aaron Edwin (1807-1870)
Pemberton, Christopher Robert, M.D. (1705-
	Pour, Granvillo (1701-1844)
1822)	Penn, James (1727-1800)
Pemberton, Sir Francis (1025-1607) . 724	Penn, John (1729-1795)
Pemberton, Henry (1694-1771)	Ponn, John (1700-1884)
Pemberton (afterwards Pemberton Leigh),	Penn, John (1770-1818). See under Penn,
Thomas, Baron Kingsdown (1798-1867) . 726	John (1805–1878),
Pemble, William (1502?-1628)	Penn, John (1805–1878)
Pembridge, Christopher (fl. 1870?) 728	Ponn, Richard (1786-1811)
Pembridge or Pembrugge, Bir Richard de (d.	Penn, Richard (1784-1888). See under Penn, 1875)	Richard (1786–1811).
Pombroke, Earls of. See under Roger de	Ponn, Thomas (1709-1775)
Montgomery; Clare, Richard de, d. 1176,	Penn, Sir William (1621–1670) called Stronghow, second Earl of the Claro	Ponn, William (1641-1718)
lino; Marshal, William, Arst Earl of the	Ponn, William (1770-1845). See under Penn, Marshal line, d. 1219; Marshal, William,	Richard (1786-1811).
second Earl of the Marshal line, d. 1281;	Danagari Tidhawi Hayan Danahan /1888 0
	TORRIBLE INCHESTIC DISCONDUCTION (III)
	Pomant, Richard, Baron Ponthyn (1787?-
Marshal, Richard, third Barl of the Mar- shal line d. 1984: William de Valence d.	1808) shall line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d.	1808)
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d. 1298; Aymer de Valence, d. 1824; Hast-	1808)
shal line, d. 1254; William de Valence, d. 1296; Aymer de Valence, d. 1824; Hast- ings, Laurence, first Rarl of the Hastings	1808) . 768 Pennant, Thomas (1720–1799) . 768 Pennaoulk, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1792) . 768 Pennaoulk, Alexander (d. 1780). Hee under
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d. 1236; Aymer de Valence, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1318, 1318; Hastings Tabe	1808)
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d. 1236; Aymer de Valence, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1318, 1318; Hastings Tabe	1808)
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d. 1236; Aymer de Valence, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1318, 1318; Hastings Tabe	1808) 768 Pennant, Thomas (1720-1798) 768 Pennaoulit, Alexander, M.D. (1052-1792) 768 Pennaoulit, Alexander (d. 1730) 8ee under Pennaoulit, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1792) Pennafuther, Ontherine (1818-1808). 8ee under Pennafuther, William.
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d. 1236; Aymer de Valence, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1318, 1318; Hastings Tabe	1808) . 768 Pennant, Thomas (1720–1798) . 768 Pennaoulk, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1792) . 768 Pennaoulk, Alexander (d. 1780). See under Pennaoulk, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1722). Pennafabluer, Cabberine (1418–1898). See under Pennafabluer, William. Pennafabluer, Bluward (1774.2–1847) . 770
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d. 1236; Aymer de Valence, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1318, 1318; Hastings Tabe	1808) . 768 Pennant, Thomas (1720–1798) . 768 Pennaoulk, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1792) . 768 Pennaoulk, Alexander (d. 1780). See under Pennaoulk, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1722). Pennafabluer, Cabberine (1418–1898). See under Pennafabluer, William. Pennafabluer, Bluward (1774.2–1847) . 770
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d. 1236; Aymer de Valence, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1318, 1318; Hastings Tabe	1808) . 768 Pennant, Thomas (1720–1798) . 768 Pennaoulk, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1792) . 768 Pennaoulk, Alexander (d. 1780). See under Pennaoulk, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1722). Pennafabluer, Cabberine (1418–1898). See under Pennafabluer, William. Pennafabluer, Bluward (1774.2–1847) . 770
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valence, d. 1236; Aymer de Valence, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1318, 1318; Hastings Tabe	1808) Tennant, Thomas (1720-1798) Tennant, Thomas (1720-1798) Tennantit, Alexander, M.D. (1052-1793) Tennaculk, Alexander (d. 1730). See under Pennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722). Tennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722). Tennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722). Tennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722). Tennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1648-1898). See under Pennaculk, William. Tennaculk, Bulward (1774 2-1847). Tennaculk, Sir John Tysaght (1800-1872). 770 Tennaculk, Tibliard (1808-1840). See under
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431-1440; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbert line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbert, William, second Earl, 1461-1491; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbert line.	1808) Tennant, Thomas (1720-1798) Tennant, Thomas (1720-1798) Tennantit, Alexander, M.D. (1052-1793) Tennaculk, Alexander (d. 1730). See under Pennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722). Tennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722). Tennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722). Tennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722). Tennaculk, Alexander, M.D. (1648-1898). See under Pennaculk, William. Tennaculk, Bulward (1774 2-1847). Tennaculk, Sir John Tysaght (1800-1872). 770 Tennaculk, Tibliard (1808-1840). See under
shal line, d. 1294; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first léarl of the Hastings line, 1818?—1848; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847—1975; Tudor, Jasper, 1491?—1495; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the llerbert line of the first creation, d. 1469; Herbert, William, second Earl, 1461—1491; Herbert, Sir William, first léarl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 4501?—1570; Her-	1808) 768 Pennant, Thomas (1720-1798) 768 Pennaoulit, Alexander, M.D. (1052-1799) 768 Pennaoulit, Alexander (d. 1730) 8ee under Pennooulit, Alexander (d. 1730) 8ee under Pennooulit, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1722) Pennofather, Catherine (1818-1898) 8ee under Pennofather, William Pennefather, Edward (1774?-1847) 770 Pennofather, Sir John Inysaght (1800-1872) 770 Pennofather, Richard (1808-1849) 8ee under Pennofather, Richard (1808-1849) 771 Pennofather, Biolard (1778-1859) 771
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1290; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818?—1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847—1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?—1405; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbort, William, second Earl, 1461—1401; Horbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Horbort line of the second creation, 1501?—1570; Herbort, Linry, second Earl of the Herbort	J808) 768 Pennant, Thomas (1720–1798) 768 Pennant, Thomas (1720–1798) 768 Pennanti, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1724) 768 Pennantik, Alexander (d. 1780). See under Pennantik, Alexander (d. 1780). See under Pennantik, Alexander (1652–1722). Pennantik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722). Pennantik, Alexander, William. Pennaltik, Bulward (1774–1847). Pennantik, Bulward (1774–1847). Tomatakher, Bichard (1808–1849). See under Pennantikher, Richard (1808–1849). See under Pennantikher, Richard (1778–1859). 771 Pennantikher, Richard (1778–1859). 771 Pennantikher, William (1818–1878). 772
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818-2-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1975; Tudor, Jasper, 1431-2-140; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbort, William, second Earl, 1461-1401; Herbort, Sir William, first Harl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 15012-1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 15042-1601;	1808) 768 Ponnant, Thomas (1720-1798) 768 Ponnant, Thomas (1720-1798) 768 Ponnantii, Alexander, M.D. (1052-1792) 768 Pennequik, Alexander (d. 1730). See under Pennequik, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1792). Ponnefather, Catherine (1818-1898). See under Pennefather, William. Pennefather, Edward (1774 ?-1847) 770 Pennefather, Edward (1774 ?-1847). See under Pennefather, Richard (1808-1849). See under Pennefather, Richard (1778-1859). 771 Pennefather, William (1818-1878). 772 Pennefather, William (1818-1878). 773 Pennefather, William (1818-1878). 773
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818-2-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1975; Tudor, Jasper, 1431-2-140; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbort, William, second Earl, 1461-1401; Herbort, Sir William, first Harl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 15012-1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 15042-1601;	768 Pennant, Thomas (1720-1798) Pennant, Thomas (1720-1798) Pennanti, Alexander, M.D. (1052-1792) Pennequik, Alexander (d. 1730) Pennequik, Alexander, M.D. (1652-1792) Pennefather, Catherine (1818-1898) Pennefather, Catherine (1818-1898) Pennefather, Edward (1774 ?-1847) Pennefather, Edward (1774 ?-1847) Pennefather, Richard (1808-1849) Pennefather, Richard (1779-1859) Pennefather, Richard (1779-1859) Pennefather, William (1818-1878) Pennefather, William (1818-1878) Pennefather, William (1818-1878) Pennefather, John (1808-1888)
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818-2-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1975; Tudor, Jasper, 1431-2-140; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbort, William, second Earl, 1461-1401; Herbort, Sir William, first Harl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 15012-1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 15042-1601;	768
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?-1405; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbert line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbert, William, second Earl, 1461-1401; Herbert, Herbert, Herry, second earl, of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1501?-1570; Herbert, Henry, second Earl of the 11erbert line of the second oreation, 1501?-1600-1680; Herbert, Philip, fourth Harl, 1680-1680; Herbert, Philip, fourth Harl, 1684-1650; Herbert, Philip, fourth Harl, 1600-1788;	768   768
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818?—1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847—1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?—1495; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first exaction, d. 1460; Horbort, William, second Earl, 1461—1491; Herbort, Sir William, first Barl of the Horbort line of the second creation, 1501?—1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 1584?—1601; Herbort, William, third Earl, 1684—1660; Herbort, Fhilip, fourth Harl, 1680—1080; Herbort, Thomas, eighth Earl, 1680—1781; Herbort, Henry, ninth Earl, 1050—1781;	768   768
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818?—1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847—1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?—1495; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first exaction, d. 1460; Horbort, William, second Earl, 1461—1491; Herbort, Sir William, first Barl of the Horbort line of the second creation, 1501?—1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 1584?—1601; Herbort, William, third Earl, 1684—1660; Herbort, Fhilip, fourth Harl, 1680—1080; Herbort, Thomas, eighth Earl, 1680—1781; Herbort, Henry, ninth Earl, 1050—1781;	768   768   768   768   768   768   768   768   768   768   769   768   769
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818?—1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847—1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?—1495; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first exaction, d. 1460; Horbort, William, second Earl, 1461—1491; Herbort, Sir William, first Barl of the Horbort line of the second creation, 1501?—1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 1584?—1601; Herbort, William, third Earl, 1684—1660; Herbort, Fhilip, fourth Harl, 1680—1080; Herbort, Thomas, eighth Earl, 1680—1781; Herbort, Henry, ninth Earl, 1050—1781;	1808   768
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1290; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818; 2-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1491; 2-1495; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Hesbert line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbert, William, second Earl, 1461-1491; Herbert, William, second creation, 1501; 2-1570; Herbert, Honry, second Earl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1504; 2-1601; Herbert, William, third Earl, 1684; 2-1601; Herbert, Philip, fourth Earl, 1684-1650; Herbert, Flampy, ninth Earl, 1099-1783; Herbert, Henry, tenth Earl, 1099-1781; Herbert, Henry, tenth Earl, 1784-1704; Herbert, Henry, tenth Earl, 1784-1704; Herbert, Henry, tenth Earl, 1784-1704;	1808
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431-1440; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbert line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbert, William, second Earl, 1461-1491; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1501 9-1570; Herbert, Henry, second Earl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1504 9-1670; Herbert, Henry, second Earl of the 11erbert line of the second creation, 1504-1600; Herbert, Philip, fourth Earl, 1680-1680; Herbert, Thomas, eighbl Earl, 1600-1788; Herbert, Henry, ninth Earl, 1698-1751; Herbert, Cleorge Augustus, cleventh Earl, 1750-1887.	1808   768
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1290; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818; ?—1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847—1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?—1495; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbort line of the second Earl, 1461—1491; Horbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Horbort line of the second creation, 1501?—1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbort line of the second creation, 1534?—1630; Herbort, William, third Earl, 1534—1630; Herbort, Thomas, eighth Earl, 1630—1783; Herbort, Henry, ninth Earl, 1630—1783; Herbort, Henry, senth Earl, 1734—1794; Herbort, Goorge Augustus, cleventh Earl, 1759—1837.	768   768
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1290; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818; 2-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1491; 2-1495; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbert line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbert, William, second Earl, 1461-1491; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Horbert line of the second creation, 1501; 2-1570; Herbert, Honry, second Earl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1504; 2-1601; Herbert, William, third Earl, 1684, 2-1601; Herbert, William, third Earl, 1684-1650; Herbert, Fhilip, fourth Earl, 1684-1650; Herbert, Henry, ninth Earl, 1099-1781; Herbert, Henry, tenth Earl, 1099-1781; Herbert, Henry, tenth Earl, 1684-1704; Herbert, George Augustus, cleventh Earl, 1759-1897.	1808
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1200; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818-1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847-1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?-1405; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbert line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbert, William, second Earl, 1461-1401; Herbert, Henry, second Earl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1501?-1570; Herbert, Henry, second Earl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1504?-1600; Herbert, Henry, second Earl of the Herbert, Herbert, Herbert, Spilliam, third Earl, 1680-1680; Herbert, Philip, fourth Herl, 1680-1680; Herbert, Thomas, eighth Earl, 1680-1783; Herbert, Henry, ninth Earl, 1690-1783; Herbert, Henry, tenth Earl, 1784-1704; Herbert, George Augustus, cleventh Earl, 1750-1827.  embreke, titular Earl of (d. 1200). See William de Valonce.	1808
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1290; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818?—1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847—1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?—1495; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbort, William, second Earl, 1461—1491; Horbert, Sir William, first Barl of the Horbert line of the second creation, 1501?—1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1534?—1601; Herbort, William, third Earl, 1534—1630; Herbort, Thomas, eighth Earl, 1650—1680; Herbort, Henry, ninth Earl, 1650—1680; Herbort, Henry, senth Earl, 1744—1794; Herbort, Goorge Augustus, cleventh Earl, 1759—1827.  embroke, titular Earl of (d. 1298). See William de Valonce.  broke, Countesson of See Herbort, Levy, 1555?—1621; Chifford, Anne, 1590—	Jennant, Thomas (1726–1798) 768 Pennant, Thomas (1726–1798) 768 Pennant, Alexander, M.D. (1052–1724) 768 Pennaeuik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1724) 768 Penneeuik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722) 768 Penneeuik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722) 769 Penneeuik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722) 760 under Pennefather, Chilerine (1818–1898) 770 Pennefather, Bidward (1774 7–1847) 770 Pennefather, Richard (1808–1849) 770 Pennefather, Richard (1808–1859) 771 Pennefather, Richard (1808–1859) 771 Pennefather, William (1818–1878) 772 Pennethorne, John (1808–1888) 774 Pennethorne, John (1808–1888) 776 Pennington, Sir James (1801–1871) 778 Pennington, Sir James (1777–1862) 776 Pennington, James (1777–1863) 777 Pennington, Sir John (1784 Daven Muneaster in the poorage of treland and fifth Brennethernethenether Sir John, first Daven Muneaster
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1290; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1824; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818; 2–1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847–1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?–1405; Herbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbert line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbert, William, second Earl, 1461–1401; Horbert, Sir William, first Earl of the Horbert line of the second creation, 1501?–1570; Herbert, Honry, second Earl, 1601?–1570; Herbert, Honry, second Earl, 1684?–1601; Herbert, William, third Earl, 1684–1650; Herbert, Philip, fourth Earl, 1684–1650; Herbert, Thomas, eighth Earl, 1650–1768; Herbert, Henry, ninth Earl, 1764–1704; Herbert, Henry, tenth Earl, 1009–1781; Herbert, George Augustus, cleventh Earl, 1750–1887.  'embroke, titular Earl of (d. 1890). See William de Valonce.  broke, Countessee of. See Herbert, ary, 1565?–1621; Clifford, Anne, 1690–76.	Jennant, Thomas (1726–1798) 768 Pennant, Thomas (1726–1798) 768 Pennant, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1723) 768 Pennantik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1723) 768 Pennantik, Alexander (d. 1780). See under Pennantik, Alexander (d. 1780). See under Pennantik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722). Pennantik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722). Pennantik, Balward (1774–1847). See under Pennantikher, Balward (1774–1847). See under Pennantikher, Richard (1808–1849). See under Pennantikher, Richard (1778–1859). 771 Pennantikher, Richard (1778–1859). 771 Pennantikher, William (1818–1878). 772 Pennatikorne, Sir James (1801–1871). 773 Pennatikorne, Sir James (1801–1871). 774 Pennington, Sir James (1702–1848). 776 Pennington, Sir James (1777–1868). 777 Pennington, Sir John (d. 1470). See under Pennington, Sir John (d. 1470). See under Pennington, Sir John (d. 1470). See under Pennington, Sir John, first Baren Muneaster in the pearage of Ireland and fith Baronet
shal line, d. 1234; William de Valonce, d. 1290; Aymer de Valonce, d. 1234; Hastings, Laurence, first Earl of the Hastings line, 1818?—1818; Hastings, John, second Earl of the Hastings line, 1847—1875; Tudor, Jasper, 1431?—1495; Herbort, Sir William, first Earl of the Herbort line of the first creation, d. 1460; Herbort, William, second Earl, 1461—1491; Horbert, Sir William, first Barl of the Horbert line of the second creation, 1501?—1570; Herbort, Henry, second Earl of the Herbert line of the second creation, 1534?—1601; Herbort, William, third Earl, 1534—1630; Herbort, Thomas, eighth Earl, 1650—1680; Herbort, Henry, ninth Earl, 1650—1680; Herbort, Henry, senth Earl, 1744—1794; Herbort, Goorge Augustus, cleventh Earl, 1759—1827.  embroke, titular Earl of (d. 1298). See William de Valonce.  broke, Countesson of See Herbort, Levy, 1555?—1621; Chifford, Anne, 1590—	Jennant, Thomas (1726–1798) 768 Pennant, Thomas (1726–1798) 768 Pennant, Thomas (1726–1798) 768 Pennantili, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722) 768 Pennaculik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722) 768 Pennaculik, Alexander (d. 1780). See under Pennaculik, Alexander, M.D. (1652–1722) 760 Pennaculik, Alexander (1774–1847) 860 under Pennaculik, Edward (1774–1847) 770 Pennaculik, Edward (1774–1859). 770 Pennaculik, Richard (1808–1849). 960 Pennaculik, Richard (1778–1859). 771 Pennaculik, Richard (1778–1859). 771 Pennaculik, Kichard (1778–1859). 772 Pennaculik, Kichard (1808–1888) 774 Pennaculik, Kichard (1808–1888) 774 Pennaculik, Kichard (1762–1848) 776 Pennington, First Janack (1762–1848) 776 Pennington, First Janack (1762–1848) 777 Pennington, First John (d. 1470). See under Pennington, Sir John, first Baron Muneaster in the pearage of Ireland and fith Baronet

Pennington, Sir Lowther, second Beron Mun-	Page Percy, Henry (1228?-1272). See under
caster (1745-1818). See under Pennington,	Percy, Henry (1228?-1272). See under Percy, Henry, first Baron Percy of Alnwick.
Sir John, first Baron Muncaster in the	Percy, Henry, first Baron Percy of Alnwick
_ peerage of Ireland and fifth Baronet.	(1272 ?-1815)
Pennington, Montagu (1762-1849)	Percy, Henry, second Baron Percy of Alnwick
Penny, Edward (1714-1791)	(1299 ?-1852)
Penny, John (1808-1885)	Percy, Henry, third Baron Percy of Alnwick
Penny, Nicholas (1790-1858)	(1822–1868). See under Percy, Henry, second Baron Percy of Alnwick.
Penny, Thomas, M.D. (d. 1589) 782	Percy, Sir Henry, called Hotspur (1864-
Pennycuick, John (d. 1849)	1408)
Pennycuick, John Farrell (1829-1888) 783	Percy, Henry, first Earl of Northumberland
Pennyman, John (1628–1706)	(1342-1408)
Pennyman, Sir William (1607–1648) 785	Peroy, Henry, second Earl of Northumber- land (1894-1455)
Penrhyn, Lord (1787?–1808). See Pennant, Richard.	Percy, Henry, third Earl of Northumberland
Penrose, Sir Charles Vinicombe (1759-	(1421-1461). See under Percy, Henry,
1880)	second Earl of Northumberland.
Penrose, Mrs. Elizabeth (1780-1887), writer	Percy, Henry, fourth Earl of Northumberland
under the pseudonym of Mrs. Markham . 787	(1416-1489)
Penrose, Francis (1718–1708)	Percy, Henry, eighth Earl of Northumberland
Penrose, John (1778–1859)	(1532 ?-1585) 854
Penrose, Thomas (1742–1779)	Percy, Henry, ninth Earl of Northumberland
Penruddock, John (1819–1855) 790	(1564–1682)
Penry, John (1559-1593)	Percy, Henry, Lord Percy of Alnwick (d.
Clinton Sydney, first Baron, 1780-1865:	1659)
Smythe, George Augustus Frederick Percy.	Percy, Henry Algernon, fifth Earl of North-
second Baron, 1818-1857; Smythe, Percy Ellen Frederick William, third Baron,	umberland (1478-1527)
Ellen Frederick William, third Baron,	Percy, Henry Algernon, sixth Earl of North- umberland (1502?-1587)
18261869.	umberland (1502?-1597) 861
Penshurst, Stephen de. See Pencester.	Percy, Lord Henry Hugh Manyers (1817-
Pentland, Joseph Barclay (1797–1878) 795	1877)
Penton, Stephen (1689–1706)	Percy, Hugh, whose surname was originally
Pentrouth, Dolly (1685-1777). See Jeffery, Dorothy.	Smithson, first Duke of Northumberland of the third creation (1715-1786) 868
Peploe, Samuel (1668-1752)	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752)	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742–1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742–1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752)	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742–1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1608–1752)	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusell, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1781–1851) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1750) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Penys, Sir Richard (1688 2–1659) . 804	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1680) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1688 ?–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1693–1708) . 805	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1750) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cotenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588?–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1608–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottonham (1781–1851) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588?–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1683–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742–1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1661) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1688 ?–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1688–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Alexander (1787–1858) . 812	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742–1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1688–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1806–1750) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1781–1651) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588?–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1688–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 312 Perceval, Alexander (1787–1858) . 812 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1858) . 813 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742–1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1661) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1680) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1688–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1688–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perceval, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1688) . 813 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 812	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1661) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588?–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1698–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Percoval, Alexander (1767–1858) . 812 Percoval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688– 1748) . 818 Perceval, John, second Earl of Egmont (1711–	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742–1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1688–1752) 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1806–1750) 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1781–1651) 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588?–1659) 804 Pepys, Samuel (1688–1708) 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) 811 Perburn, John (f. 1816–1848) 812 Perceval, Alexander (1787–1858) 813 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1858) 813 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) 818 Perceval, John, second Earl of Egmont (1711–1770) 815	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1750) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1788–1860) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1688–1669) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1688–1669) . 804 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Alexander (1787–1858) . 813 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1858) . 818 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 818 Perceval, John, second Earl of Egmont (1711–1770) . 815 Perceval, Sir Philip (1605–1647) . 818	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1769) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Richard (1782–1860) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1693–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Percoval, Alexander (1767–1858) . 812 Percoval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 818 Perceval, John, second Earl of Egmont (1711–1770) . 815 Perceval, Sir Philip (1605–1647) . 818 Perceval, Richard (1650–1647) . 818 Perceval, Richard (1650–1647) . 818	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Gharles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1768–1860) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1680) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1583–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1633–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (f. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Alexander (1787–1858) . 812 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1658) . 813 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 812 Perceval, John, second Earl of Egmont (1711–1770) . 815 Perceval, Sir Philip (1605–1647) . 818 Perceval, Richard (1550–1620) . 819 Perceval, Richard (1550–1620) . 819 Perceval, Robert, M.D. (1766–1889) . 820	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Gharles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Henry (1768–1860) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1680) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1583–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1633–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (f. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Alexander (1787–1858) . 812 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1658) . 813 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 812 Perceval, John, second Earl of Egmont (1711–1770) . 815 Perceval, Sir Philip (1605–1647) . 818 Perceval, Richard (1550–1620) . 819 Perceval, Richard (1550–1620) . 819 Perceval, Robert, M.D. (1766–1889) . 820	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1661) . 801 Pepys, Richard (1742–1680) . 808 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1680) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1680) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1688–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1683–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perceval, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1858) . 813 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1688) . 813 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 812 Perceval, Fohn, second Earl of Egmont (1711–1770) . 815 Perceval, Richard (1560–1647) . 818 Perceval, Richard (1560–1620) . 819 Perceval, Robert, M.D. (1766–1889) . 820 Perceval, Spencer (1702–1812) . 821 Perceval, John (fl. 1516 ?). See under Perci	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1750) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1861) . 801 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 808 Pepys, Sir Richard (1658–1659) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1658–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1693–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1858) . 813 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1858) . 818 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 818 Perceval, Sir Philip (1605–1647) . 816 Perceval, Richard (1560–1620) . 819 Perceval, Richard (1560–1620) . 819 Perceval, John (d. 15167) . 821 Percival, John (fl. 1650–1812) . 821 Percival, John (fl. 1650) . 827 Percival, John (fl. 1650) . 827	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1750) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1861) . 801 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 808 Pepys, Sir Richard (1658–1659) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1658–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1693–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1858) . 813 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1858) . 818 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 818 Perceval, Sir Philip (1605–1647) . 816 Perceval, Richard (1560–1620) . 819 Perceval, Richard (1560–1620) . 819 Perceval, John (d. 15167) . 821 Percival, John (fl. 1650–1812) . 821 Percival, John (fl. 1650) . 827 Percival, John (fl. 1650) . 827	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1651) . 801 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1860) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1860) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588?–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1693–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (ft. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Alexander (1787–1858) . 812 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1858) . 813 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 812 Perceval, John, second Earl of Egmont (1711–1770) . 815 Perceval, Richard (1550–1647) . 818 Perceval, Robert, M.D. (1756–1889) . 820 Perceval, Spencer (1702–1812) . 821 Percival, John (ft. 1515) . See under Percival, John (ft. 1550) . 827 Percival, John (ft. 1650) . 827 Percival, Thomas (1719–1702) . 828	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668-1752)	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668-1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696-1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667-1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761-1661) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761-1661) . 801 Pepys, Bir Lucas (1742-1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742-1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1688-1-1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1698-1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775-1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816-1848) . 812 Perceval, Alexander (1787-1858) . 812 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799-1858) . 818 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688-1748) . 819 Perceval, John, second Harl of Egmont (1711-1770) . 815 Perceval, Richard (1550-1620) . 819 Perceval, Richard (1550-1620) . 819 Perceval, Robert, M.D. (1766-1889) . 820 Perceval, John (fl. 1550) . 827 Percival, John (fl. 1550) . 827 Percival, Thomas (1719-1762) . 828	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1696–1759) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1661) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1661) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1688 ?–1659) . 804 Pepys, Samuel (1698–1708) . 805 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (fl. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Alexander (1787–1858) . 812 Perceval, Arthur Philip (1799–1858) . 818 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 819 Perceval, Filip (1605–1647) . 818 Perceval, Richard (1550–1620) . 819 Perceval, Richard (1550–1620) . 819 Perceval, Robert, M.D. (1766–1889) . 820 Perceval, John (fl. 1516?) . 827 Percival, John (fl. 1550) . 827 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 828 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 828 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 828 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 829 Percival, Alexander (1760–1804) . 829 Percival, Alexander (1760–1804) . 829 Percival, Alexander (1718–1760) . 827 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 828 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 829 Percival, Alexander (1760–1804) . 829	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1750) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1861) . 801 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 808 Pepys, Sir Iucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588–1659) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588–1659) . 804 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (f. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1858) . 813 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1858) . 818 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 818 Perceval, Sir Philip (1605–1647) . 816 Perceval, Richard (1580–1620) . 819 Perceval, Richard (1560–1620) . 819 Perceval, John (d. 1515 ?). See under Percival, John (d. 1515 ?). See under Percival, John (f. 1550) . 827 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 828 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 828 Percy, Algaron, tenth Earl of Northumberland (16162–1606) . 829 Percy, Algaron, tenth Earl of Northumberland (16162–1606) . 829	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752)	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752)	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)
Peploe, Samuel (1668–1752) . 797 Pepperell, Sir William (1606–1750) . 798 Pepusch, John Christopher (1667–1752) . 799 Pepwell, Henry (d. 1540) . 801 Pepys, Charles Christopher, first Earl of Cottenham (1761–1861) . 801 Pepys, Sir Lucas (1742–1880) . 808 Pepys, Sir Iucas (1742–1880) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588–1659) . 804 Pepys, Sir Richard (1588–1659) . 804 Pepys, William Hasledine (1775–1856) . 811 Perburn, John (f. 1816–1848) . 812 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1858) . 813 Perceval, Arkhur Philip (1799–1858) . 818 Perceval, John, first Earl of Egmont (1688–1748) . 818 Perceval, Sir Philip (1605–1647) . 816 Perceval, Richard (1580–1620) . 819 Perceval, Richard (1560–1620) . 819 Perceval, John (d. 1515 ?). See under Percival, John (d. 1515 ?). See under Percival, John (f. 1550) . 827 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 828 Percival, Thomas (1719–1762) . 828 Percy, Algaron, tenth Earl of Northumberland (16162–1606) . 829 Percy, Algaron, tenth Earl of Northumberland (16162–1606) . 829	Percy, Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817)

PAGE	Tion
Perigal, Arthur (1816-1884). See under	Peter of Ickham (fl. 1200?). See Ickham.
Perigal, Arthur (1784 ?-1847).	Poter Martyr (1500-1502). See Vormigli,
Perkins. See also Parkins. Perkins. Angier March (1709?–1881)	Pietro Martiro.
Perkins, Angior March (1709?–1881)	Poter the Wild Boy (1712–1785)
1099)	Poter, David (1765–1837) 961 Poter, William (1788–1858) 963
Porking, Honry (1778-1855)	Peterborough, Earls of. See Mordaunt, Henry,
Perkins or Parkins, John (d. 1545)	second Earl, 1624?-1697; Mordaunt, rerkms, Joseph (N. 1711)	Charles, third Earl, 1658-1785.
Perkins, Loftus (1884-1891) 802	Poterborough, Counters of See Robinson, Anastasia (d. 1755).
Perkins, William (1558–1602)	Anastasia (d. 1756).
Porloy, Moses Henry (1804–1862) 805 Perne, Andrew (1610 ?–1580) 806	Peterborough, Benedict of (d. 1198). See
Porne, Andrew (1606–1664). See under Perne,	Peterborough, John of (fl. 1880). See John.
Andrew (1610 ?-1680).	Peterborough, William of (fl. 1188). Bee
Perrers or de Windsor, Alico (d. 1400) 898	William.
Periin, Jean Baptiste (fl. 1786). See under	Peterkin, Alexander (1780–1846)
Perriu, Louis.	Peterkin, Alexander (1814–1880). See under
Porm, Louis (1782-1861)	Peterkin, Alexander (1780–1840).
Perrinohief, Richard (1628?-1678) 901	Poters, Charles, M.D. (1695-1746)
Porring, John Shae (1818–1860)	Peters, Charles (1690–1774)
Perronet, Edward (1721-1792). See under	Peters or Peter, Hugh (1898-1660)
Perronet, Vincent (1698–1785)	Poters, Mrs. Mary (1818-1856)
Porrot. George (1710-1780)	Potors or Peter, Thomas (d. 1651)
Perrot, George (1710-1780)	Potersdorff, Charles Erdman (1800-1886) , 905
Porrot, Sir James (1571-1087) 905	Paterson, Robert (fl. 1000)
Porrol, Sir John (1527?-1502)	Pelgormo, Lord (1480 ?-1580). See Scott,
Perrot, John (d. 1871?)	Thomas,
Perrot, Repert (d 1850)	Pother, Abraham (1750-1812)
Porrot, Robert.	Pother, Sebastian (1790–1814)
Perry, Charles (1698-1780) 915	Potherham, John (d. 1858)
Porry, Charles (1807-1891) 915	Potit, John Lewis (1786-1780). See under
Perry, Francis (d. 1765)	Petit, John Louis.
Porry, George (1798-1862)	Potit, John Louis (1801–1868)
Porty of Party, Henry (1500?-1617?) 918	Polit dos Rituis, Lawis (1005 ?-1720)
Perry, James (1756–1821)	Petit or Polyt or Polyte, Thomas (fl. 1586-
Perry, John (1670–1782)	1554) Potit, Petyk, or Parvus, William (1188– 1108?) Soe William) of Newburgh. Petit. William (d. 1218)
Perry, Stephen Joseph (1888–1889)	1198?) Soo William) of Nawhurch.
Porry, Sir Thomas Ersking (1806-1882) , 924	Petit, William (d. 1218
Porryn, Sir Richard (1728-1808)	Poliver, Junes (1668-1718)
Persall, alias Harcourt, John (1088-1702) . 927	Poto, Hir Hamuel Morton (1809-1889) . 972
Perso, Stephon (1548-1015)	Poto, William (d. 1558)
Perso, Stephen (1548–1615)	Potowe, Hemy (fl. 1008)
Porth, Dukes and Earls of. See Drummond, James, fourth Earl and first titular Duke,	Potro, Edward (1672–1758)
1618-1716; Drummond, Jamos, fifth Barl	Petro, Sir William (1505?-1572)
and second titular Duke, 1675-1720; Drum-	Petre, William (1002-1077)
mond, James, sixth Earl and third titular	Petre, William (1602–1677)
Duke, 1718-1747.	1084)
Portrich, Peter (d. 1461). See Partridge.	Potrie, Alexander (1504?-1662)
Parusinus, Potrus (1580?-1586?), Sae Rizari,	Petrie, George (1789-1806)
Pietra. Pery, Edmond Sexton, Viscount Pery (1719-	Potrio, Honry (1768-1842)
1808)	Petric, Martin (1828–1802)
Pery, Edmund Henry, Earl of Limerick (1758-	Podrog.
19.(5)	Petronius (d. 654)
Peryam, Sir William (1684–1604)	Petrneci, Ludovico (fl. 1619)
Peryam, Sir William (1684–1604)	Potens (d. 0002)
Poshall or Pochell, Sir John (1718–1778) . 981	Pott, Peter (d. 1580)
Touron' Thomas (Took t-Took t) NST	Pett, Peter (1010-1070?)
Postell, Thomas (1818–1701). See under	Pett, Sir Peter (1080-1699)
Potor (d. 1085)	Pett, Phinoas (1570-1647)
Poter of Blois (fl. 1190)	Pottio, John (1889–1808)
Peter Hibernicus, de Hibernia, or de Isernia	Politigrew, Thomas Joseph (1791-1866) 994
(#.1224)	Pottingall or Pottingal, John (1708-1781) . 995
Peter des Roches (d. 128H)	Pottingall, Thomas (1745-1826). See under
Peter of Savoy, Earl of Richmond (d. 1268), 042	Pottingall or Pottingal, John.
Peter of Aigueblanche (d. 1268)	Pottith, Henry (1848-1898)

2100
Page Potts Commel (18949 1811) 005	PAGE
Petto, Samuel (1624?-1711)	Philippart, John (1784?-1874)
Pettus, Sir John (1618–1690)	Philipps. See also Phelips, Philips, Phil-
Petty, Sir William (1628-1687) 999	lipps, and Phillips.
Petty, Sir William (1628–1687) . 999 Petty, William, first Marquis of Lansdowne,	Philipps, Baker (1718 ?-1745)
better known as Lord Shelburne(1787-1805) 1005	Philipps, Sir Erasmus (d. 1743) 1055
Petty-Fitzmaurice, Henry, third Marquis of	Dhiliana Dahian /1001 1000)
Tongdown (1700 1000)	Philipps, Fabian (1601–1690)
Lansdowne (1780–1868)	Philipps, Jenkin Thomas (d. 1755) 1056
Petty-Fitzmaurice, Henry Thomas, fourth	Philipps or Philippes, Morgan (d. 1570) . 1057
Marquis of Lansdowne (1816–1866)	Philipps, Thomas (1774-1841) 1057
Pettyt, Thomas (1510 ?-1558?)	Philips. See also Phelips, Philipps,
Petyt, William (1841?-1707)	lipps, and Phillips.
Peverell, Thomas (d. 1119)	Philips, Ambrose (1675?-1749) 1058
Peverell, William (ft. 1155) 1020	Dillia Charles (1010 (-1140) 1000
Dente William (2 1550) Car Date	Philips, Charles (1708-1747)
Peyto, William (d. 1558). See Peto.	Philips or Phillips, George (1599?-1696) . 1060
Peyton, Sir Edward (1588?-1657) 1020	Philips, Humphrey (1693–1707)
Peyton, Edward (d. 1749) 1021	Philips, John (1676–1709) 1061
Peyton, Sir Henry (d. 1622?) 1022	Philips, Katherine (1631–1664) 1068
Peyton, Sir John (1544-1680) 1028	Philips, Miles (ft 1587)
Peyton, Sir John (1579-1685). See under	Philips, Nathaniel George (1795-1881) 1065
Peyton, Sir John (1544-1680).	Philips, Peregrine (1628–1691) 1065
Perton Sin John Startt (1898 1988) 1004	Philips, Peregrine (1628–1691) 1065 Philips or Philippi, Peter or Pietro (fl. 1580–
Peyton, Sir John Strutt (1786–1888) 1024	Finites of Finitepy, Feder of Fleuro (Jr. 1360-
Peyton, Thomas (1595-1626) 1025	1621)
Peyton, Sir John Strutt (1788–1888) . 1024 Peyton, Thomas (1595–1626) . 1025 Pfoiffer, Emily Jane (1827–1890) . 1025	Philips or Phillips, Richard (1661-1751) . 1067
Final or Final Communication (1910) - 1000 (1910) - 1020	Philips, Robert (ft. 1549-1559?). See under
Phalerius, Gullielmus (1804-1678), See	Philips or Philippi, Peter or Pietro.
Phalerius, Gullielmus (1804–1678). See White, William.	Philips, Robert (d. 1650?) 1067
Phayre, Sir Arthur Purves (1812-1885) . 1027	Philips, Rowland (d. 1588?) 1068
	Dhiling William (7 1791)
Phayre or Phaire, Robert (1619?-1682) . 1028	Philips, William (d. 1784)
Phelips. See also Philipps, Philips, Phillipps,	Phillimore, Greville (1821-1884) 1068
and Phillips.	Phillimore, Sir John (1781–1810) 1069
Phelips, Sir Edward (1560?-1614) 1029	Phillimore, John George (1808–1865) 1071
Phelips, Sir Robert (1586?-1688) 1080	Phillimore, Joseph (1775-1855) 1071
Phelps, John (fl. 1649)	Phillimore, Sir Robert Joseph (1810-1885) . 1072
Phelps, Samuel (1804–1878) 1082	Phillip. See also Philip and Phylip.
Phelps, Thomas (fl. 1685)	Phillip, Arthur (1788–1814) 1074
Z 1101-pa; Z 1101100 ( /e. 1000 ) 1000
The line (1) 1000	TO THE T-1- (101 F 100F)
Phelps, Thomas (fl. 1750)	Phillip, John (1817–1867) 1075
Phelps, Thomas (ft. 1750)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phelps, William (1776–1856). 1086 Pherd, John (d. 1225), properly called John	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de.	Phillip, John (1817–1867) . 1075 Phillip, William (A. 1600) . 1077 Phillipps. See also Phelips, Philipps, Philips, and Phillips.
of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de.	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de.  Phesant, Peter (1680?-1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (z. 1225), property called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580 ?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (z. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1887)
Fherd, John (z. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (z. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesent, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (z. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (z. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (z. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Phera, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesent, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)   1075
Fherd, John (z. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)   1075
Fherd, John (a. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)   1075
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de.  Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)  Philalethes, Eirenæus and Eugenius, pseudonym. See under Starkey, George.  Philidor, François André Danican (1726–1795)  Philip. See also Phillip and Phylip.  Philip of Montgomery (d. 1099). See under Roger of Montgomery (d. 1098?).  Philip de Thaun (fl. 1120)  Philip de Braose (fl. 1172). See Braose.  Philip of Poitlers (d. 1908?).  Philip or Philippe de Rim or de Remi (1246?–1296).	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Frontains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?-1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1887)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Frontains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?-1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Fherd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de.  Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de.  Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?-1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?-1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de.  Phesant, Peter (1580?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?–1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1887)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de.  Phesant, Peter (1580?—1649) . 1086  Philalethes, Eirenæus and Eugenius, pseudonym. See under Starkey, George.  Philidor, François André Danican (1726—1795) . 1087  Philip. See also Phillip and Phylip.  Philip of Montgomery (d. 1099). See under Roger of Montgomery (d. 1098?).  Philip de Thaun (fl. 1120) . 1089  Philip de Braose (fl. 1172). See Braose.  Philip de Poitlers (d. 1208?) . 1040  Philip or Philippe de Rim or de Remi (1246?—1296) . 1040  Philip de Valognes or Valoniis (d. 1215). See Valognes.  Philip de Ulecot (d. 1220). See Ulecot.  Philip II of Spain (1527—1598). See under Mary I, Queen of England.  Philip, John (176—1861) . 1042  Philip, John (fl. 1566) . 1042  Philip, John Birnie (1824—1875) . 1044  Philip, John Birnie (1824—1875) . 1044  Philip, John Birnie (1824—1875) . 1044  Philip, Robert (1791—1858) . See Murray, Sir James.	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1887)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1680?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1887)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1867)
Frerd, John (d. 1225), properly called John of Fountains. See Fontibus, John de. Phesant, Peter (1580?—1649)	Phillip, John (1817–1887)

T. C.
PAGE PAGE (1814–1854)	Diama Camara Tala Maria sana
Phillips, Samuel (1814–1854) 1098 Phillips, Teresia Constantia (1709–1785) 1099	Diores of Deines (1746–1829)
Phillips, Teresis Constitutes (1700-1700) . 1000	Diagram William (1892-1691) 1146
Phillips, Thomas (1685?~1698) 1100	Pierce, William (1580-1070). See Piers.
Phillips, Thomas (1708–1774) 1101	Plorropont, Evelyn, first Duke and fifth
Phillips, Terosic Constantia (1700–1705) 1009 Phillips, Terosic Constantia (1700–1705) 1009 Phillips, Thomas (16357–1608) 1100 Phillips, Thomas (1708–1774) 1101 Phillips, Thomas (2, 1815) 1102 Phillips, Thomas (1700–1845) 1102 Phillips, Thomas (1700–1861) 1108	Piorce, Samuel Eyles (1746-1829)
Phillips, Thomas (1770–1845)	The state of the s
Phillips, Thomas (1760–1851) 1108	100 (4741-1778)
Timiles our ritorium (2001, 2001).
Phillips, Watts (1825-1871)	onester and second Farl of Kingston (1606-
Phillips, Watts (1825–1871)	1 1000 1
Phillips, William (1775–1828) 1107	Plorrepont or Pierrepoint, Robert, first Earl
Phillpotts, Henry (1778–1869)	Or Alugaton (1081-1018)
Philp, Robert Komp (1819–1882) 1111	Pierrepont, William (1607?-1678)
Philpot. See also Philipot.	Piers, Henry (d. 1628)
Philpot, John (1516–1556) 1112	Piers, Sir Henry (1628-1691). See under Piers, Henry (d. 1628).
Philipoti, Henry (1807–1892)	Piors, Henry (d. 1628).
Phipps, Sir Charles Beaumont (1801–1866) . 1114	Piers, James (fl. 1685). See under Piers,
Phipps, Sir Constantine (1050-1728) 1114	Honry (d. 1628).
Phipps, Constantine Henry, first Marquis of	Piers or Peirso, John (d. 1594)
Normanby (1797-1868)
Phipps, Constantine John, second Baron	Dines Danso on Diagon William (seco
Millorava (1744-1702)	1670)
Phipps, Edmund (1808-1857). See under	1670
Phipps, Honry, first Barl of Mulgrave and	Piorson, Abraham (d. 1678)
Viscount Normanby.	Pierson, Abraham (d. 1978)
District Classes Assessed Constanting	Pierson, originally Pearson, Henry Hugo (1815–1878).
Phipps, George Augustus Constantine, second Marquis of Normanby (1819–1890) 1118	(1010-1070)
District Harries Said World of Mulconson and	Pigg, Olivor (f. 1580)   1162   Pigg, Olivor (f. 1580)   1163
Phipps, Honry, first Earl of Mulgrave and	Direct David Distance (m. 1680)
Viscount Normanby (1765–1881)	Theor. Mindred Holiard (1797–1878)
Phipps, Joseph (1708–1787)	Pigot, Elizabeth Bridget (1788-1866) 1164
Phipps, Joseph (1708–1787) Phipps, Sir William (1651–1695) Phiston or Fiston, William (#. 1570–1609)	Pigot, George, Baron Pigot (1719-1777) . 1164
	Pigot, Sir Henry (1750-1810). See under Phiz. Soc Browne, Lablot Knight (1815-	Pigot, Hugh (1721 ?-1792).
1882).	Pigot, Hugh (1791 ?-1792)
Phrons or Fran, John (d. 1465)	Pigot, Hugh (1709-1707)
Phylip. See also Philip and Phillip.	1 1 10 10 10 10 10 10 10 10 10 10 10 10
Phylip, Sion (1648–1020) , , , , 1126	Placet, Hir Arthur Laury (1749-1810)
Phylip, William (1500?-1070) 1125	Pigold, Churles (d. 1794). Sao under Pigott,
Picken, Andrew (1788–1888) . , , , 1125	Robert.
Picken, Andrew (1815–1845) Picken, Andrew Belfrage (1802–1849). See	l'igott, Edward (fl. 1768-1807) 1109
Pickon, Andrew Belfrago (1802-1849). See	Pigalt, Sir Francis (1508-1587). See Bigod.
under Piekon, Ebenezer.	Pigott, Sir Gillery (1818-1875) 1109
Picken, Chenozer (1769-1816) 1126	Pigott, Iluriot (1700-1810). See under
Picken, Joanna Belfrago (1798-1859). Suc	Pigott, Robert.
Picken, Joanna Belfrago (1798–1859). See under Picken, Ebonezer.	Pigott, Nationaiel (d. 1804)
Pickering, Basil Montagu (1886-1878). See	1 Piroth, Richard (1898 7-1890)
under Pickering, William (1796-1854).	Pigoth, Robert (1786–1794)
Pickering, Danby (ft. 1769)	Piko, Pik, or Pyko, John (fl. 1832?) 1178
under Pickering, William (1796–1864). Pickering, Danby (ft. 1769)	Piko, John Baster (1745-1811). See under Pickering, (Leorge (d. 1857)	Pika, John Dochelas Gregory.
Pickering, (Leorge (d. 1867)	Pike, John December (1781-1851) . 1178
Pickering, Sir James (A. 1888)	Pike or Peake, Hichard (1. 1825)
Pickering, John (d. 1587)
Pickering, John (d. 1587)	Piko, Richard (1884–1898) 1175
Pickering, John (d. 1645). See under Picker-	Pike, Hamuel (1717?-1778)
ing, Sir Gilbert.	Pileh, Fuller (1808–1870)
Pickering, Thomas (d. 1475)	Pilchox, George (1801–1855)
Pickering, Sir William (1516–1575)	Pilfold, John (1776 ?-1804)
L'iokering, William (1700–1854)	Pilkington, Sir Andrew (1707?-1858) 1178
rickerngin, itomry timi (d. 1801). Boo under	Pilkington, Francis (15617-1688)
Piokoragill, Henry William.	Pilkington, Gilbort (fl. 1850)   1179   Pilkington, James (1520 ?-1570)   1179
Pickersgill, Henry William (1782-1875) . 1189	Pilkington, James (1520 ?-1570)
Pickersgill, Henry William (1782–1875) . 1182 Pickford, Edward (d. 1057). See Daniel,	Pilkington, Lautitin (1712-1750)
Edward.	Pilkington, Leonard (1527?-1500)
Pickworth, Henry (1078?-1708?)	Thurston, monor Book, with Jook rowicy
Piolon, Bir Jamos Allanson (1805–1889) . 118 (	(1828–1875). See under Pilkington,
Picton, Sir Thomas (1758-1815)	William,
Pidding Harry James (17871984) 1140	Pilkington, Mary (1700-1889) 1184
Piddington, Henry (1797–1858)	Pilkington, Matthew (fl. 1788). See under
Pidgoon, Henry Clark (1807-1880) 1148	Pilkington, Lastitia.
Pierce. See also Pearce and Pearse.	Pilkington, Matthew (d. 1705). See under Piddington, Henry (1707–1958)	Pilkington, Matthew (1700 ?-1781).
Pierce, Robert, M.D. (1622-1710)	Pilkington, Matthew (1700 ?-1781)

PAGE	PAGE
Pilkington, Redmond William (1789-1844).	Pitt, Ann (1720 ?-1799)
See under Pilkington, William.	Pitt, Christopher (1699–1748) 1228
Pilkington, Richard (1568?-1681)	Pitt, George, first Baron Rivers (1722 ?-1808) 1229
Pilkington, Robert (1765–1884)	Pitt, Harriet (d. 1814). See under Pitt,
Pilkington, Sir Thomas (d. 1691)       . 1186         Pilkington, William (1758-1848)       . 1188	Ann.
Pillans, James, LL.D. (1778–1864)	Pitt, John, second Earl of Chatham (1756- 1835)
Pillement, Jean (1727-1808)	Pitt, Moses (fl. 1654-1696)
Pilon, Frederick (1750-1788)	Pitt, Robert, M.D. (1653-1718) . 1232
Pim, Bedford Clapperton Trevelyan (1826-	Pitt, Thomas (1658–1726)
1886)	Pitt, Thomas, first Earl of Londonderry
Pinchbeck, Christopher (1670?-1782) . 1193 Pinchbeck, Christopher (1710?-1788). See Pinchbeck, Christopher (1710 7-1788). See	Pitt, Thomas, first Baron Camelford (1787-under Pinchbeck, Christopher (1670?-1782).	1798)
Pinchbeck, Edward (ft. 1782). See under	(1775-1804)
Pinchbeck, Christopher (1670 ?-1732).	Pitt, William, first Earl of Chatham (1708-
Pinck or Pink, Robert (1578-1647)	1778)
Pinckard, George, M.D. (1768-1835)	Pitt, William (1759–1806) 1253
Pindar, Sir Paul (1565?-1650)	Pitt, William (1749–1828) 1272
Pindar, Peter (1788-1819), See Wolcot, John.	Pitt, Sir William Augustus (1728-1809). See
Pine, Sir Benjamin Chilley Campbell (1809–1891)	under Pitt, George, first Baron Rivers.
1891)	Pittarrow, Lord (d. 1576). See Wishart, Sir John.
Pine, Robert Edge (1780–1788)	Pittendreich, Lord (d. 1588). See Balfour.
Pingo, Benjamin (1749-1794). See under	Sir James.
Pingo, Thomas.	Pittis, Thomas (1686–1687)
Pingo, John (fl. 1770). See under Pingo,	Pitts, William (1674-1724). See under
Thomas.	Pittis, Thomas. Pittman, Josiah (1816–1886)
Pingo, Lewis (1743–1880)	Pittman, Josiah (1816–1886)
Pink, Charles Richard (1859–1889)	Pitts, Joseph (1688–1785?)
Pink, Robert (1578-1647). See Pinck.	Pix, Mrs. Mary (1666–1720?). 1274
Pinke William (1599 2-1699) 1999	Place, Francis (1647-1728)
Pinkerton, John (1758–1826)	Par, Mrs. Mary (1666–1720 ?). 1974 Place, Francis (1647–1728) 1276 Place, Francis (1771–1864) 1276
Pinkethman, William (d. 1725) 1204	riampin, Robert (1702-1864) 1279
Pinkerton, John (1758–1826). 1202 Pinkethman, William (d. 1725) 1204 Pinkeney, Miles (1599–1674). See Carre,	Planché, James Robinson (1798–1880)
THOMAS,	Planché, Matilda Anne (1826–1881). See
Pinney, Charles (1798–1867)	Mackarness. Plant, Thomas Livesley (1819–1883) 1288
Pinnock, William (1782–1848). 1207 Pinnock, William Henry (1818–1885). See	Planta, Joseph (1744–1827)
under Pinnock, William.	Planta, Joseph (1787–1847)
Pinto, Mrs. (d. 1802). See Brent, Charlotte.	Plantagenet, Family of Pinto, George Frederic (1787-1806). See	Plantagenet, Arthur, Viscount Lisle (1480?-
under Pinto, Thomas.	1542)
Pinto, Thomas (1710?-1778)	'Plantagenet,' Edward, more correctly Edward of Norwich, second Duke of York
Pinwell, George John (1842–1875)	(1878?-1415)
Pipre, or Piper, Francis Ie (d. 1698) See Le-	Plantagenet, George, Duke of Clarence
pipre.	(1449-1478)
Piran or Piranus, Saint (fl. 550) 1212	Plat or Platt, Sir Hugh (1552-1008) 1298
Pirie, Alexander (1787–1804)	Platt, Sir Thomas Joshua (1790?-1862) . 1295
Pirie, William Robinson (1804–1885) . 1213 Pirie, William (1807–1882) . 1214	Platt, Thomas Pell (1798–1852)
Pirie, William (1807–1882)	Plattes, Gabriel (fl. 1688)
Pistrucci, Benedetto (1784–1855)	E18008, 00mm (1/10-1007)
Pitcoim, David, M.D. (1749-1809)	Plew John (1745 Y=1820)
Pitcairn, Robert (1520 ?-1584) 1218	Platts, John (1775–1887)
	Player, Sir Thomas (1608–1672) 1297   Player, Sir Thomas (d. 1686). See under Pitozirn, Robert (1747?-1770?) 1219	Player, Sir Thomas (1608-1672) 1297   Player, Sir Thomas (d. 1686). See under   Player, Sir Thomas (1608-1672).
Pitoairn, Robert (1747?-1770?)	Player, Sir Thomas (1608–1672)
Pitcairn, Robert (1747?–1770?)       1219         Pitcairn, Robert (1798–1855)       1220         Pitcairn, William, M.D. (1711–1791)       1220	Player, Sir Thomas (1608–1672)
Freegime, Archibald (1032-1710) 1221	Player, Sir Thomas (1608–1672)
Pitcarne, Alexander (1622 ?-1695)	Player, Sir Thomas (1608–1672)
Pitcarne, Alexander (1622 ?-1695) . 1228 Pitman, John Rogers (1782–1861) . 1224	Player, Sir Thomas (1608–1672)
Pitearne, Alexander (1692 ?-1695) 1228 Pitearne, John Rogers (1762-1861) 1224 Pitmead, John Rogers (1762-1861) See Seton,	Player, Sir Thomas (1608–1672)
Fitoarne, Alexander (1622 ?-1695) . 1228 Pitman, John Rogers (1782-1861) . 1224 Pitmedden, Lord (1689 ?-1719). See Seton, Sir Alexander. Pits, Arthur (1557-1684 ?) . 1226	Player, Sir Thomas (1608-1672)
Pitearne, Alexander (1622 ?-1695)       1228         Pitearne, Alexander (1622 ?-1695)       1224         Pitman, John Rogers (1782-1861)       1224         Pitmedden, Lord (1689 ?-1719)       See Seton,         Sir Alexander.       1226         Pits, Arthur (1557-1684 ?)       1226         Pits or Pitseus, John, D.D. (1580-1616)       1225	Player, Sir Thomas (1608-1672)
Pitearne, Alexander (1622 ?-1695)       1228         Pitman, John Rogers (1762-1861)       1224         Pitmedden, Lord (1689 ?-1719)       Soe Seton,         Sir Alexander       1226         Pits, Arthur (1557-1684 ?)       1225         Pits or Pitseus, John, D.D. (1580-1616)       1225         Pits, Other of (1500 ?-1555 ?)       See	Player, Sir Thomas (1608-1672)
Pitoairn, Robert (1747 ?-1770?)       . 1919         Pitoairn, Robert (1798-1855)       . 1920         Piteairn, William, M.D. (1711-1791)       . 1920         Pitoairne, Archibald (1052-1718)       . 1931         Pitoaarne, Alexander (1622 ?-1695)       . 1232         Pitman, John Rogers (1762-1861)       . 1234         Pitmedden, Lord (1689 ?-1719)       Soe Seton,         Sir Alexander.       . 1256         Pits, Arthur (1557-1684 ?)       . 1225         Pits or Pitseus, John, D.D. (1560-1616)       . 1225         Pitsoottie, Robert of (1500 ?-1555 ?)       See         Lindsay	Player, Sir Thomas (1608-1672)
Pitearne, Alexander (1622 ?-1695)       1228         Pitman, John Rogers (1762-1861)       1224         Pitmedden, Lord (1689 ?-1719)       Soe Seton,         Sir Alexander       1226         Pits, Arthur (1557-1684 ?)       1225         Pits or Pitseus, John, D.D. (1580-1616)       1225         Pits, Other of (1500 ?-1555 ?)       See	Player, Sir Thomas (1608-1672)

Plegmund (7, 914)	ł
Pleases of Pleasests, John do, Earl of Plumphre, James (1770-1882)
Warwick (d. 1208)
Plessis, Joseph Ochavo (1762-1825) 1808 Plumptre, James.
Pleasuration His Report de 14, 1898)
Pleydoll-Bouverie, Edward (1818-1880) . 1800 Plumptro, Russell (1700-1708). See under Ploydell-Bouverie, William, third Earl of Plumptre, Henry.
Radnor (1779–1869). See Bouverio.  Plumridge, Sir James Hanway (1787–1868). 1996
Plimor, Andrew (1703-1887)
Plimer, Andrew (1763-1887)
Little Little Caron and Little Caron Plimer, Andrew.
Plot, Robert (1640-1696)
Plots, John (1782–1808)
Plongh, John (7, 1662)
Ploydon, Charles (1748-1821)
Plowdon, Edmand (1818–1886)	1
Plowdon, Francis Potor (1749-1829) 1815   Plunket, William Conyugham, first Baron	ı
Plowdon, Waltor Chichele (1820–1860) 1817   Pluttet (1704–1864) 1999
Plugonet, Alan de (d. 1200)
Plugguot, Alan de (1977-1819). See under   under Chiming, Mrs. Sustande
Plugenot, Alan do (d. 1299). Plugenot, John Muhert (1802-1869) 188
Plukonok Loouard (1642-1706)	•
Plumor, Sir Thomas (1758–1824)
Plumpton, Bir Robert (1458-1528). See Windsor, first Parl of the second creation, under Plumpton, Sir William.   1627 ?1687.
Plumpton, Sir William (1404-1480) 1820   Populontage afterwards Rolfo, Robosco Plumpire, Miss Anna or Anna (1760-1818) . 1821 (1895-1617). See under Rolfe, John Plumptre, Annabella (#. 1795-1812), Sec ( 1685-1622).
under Plumptes, Anna or Anno. Posklington, John, D.D. (d. 1649)	A
Plumptre, Charles John (1818-1887) 1822 Pockrich, Pokeridge, or Puckeridge, Richard	•
Plumptre, Edward Hayes (1821–1891)	7

END OF THE FIFTHENTH VOLUME.

PHISTOD BY BPOTTHWOODS AND CO. LTD., LONDON COLORIGHTAL AND RION